

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

Look inside the lid!

If it hasn't this trademark, it isn't a Victrola

You can readily identify the Victrola by the famous Victor trademark "His Master's Voice." It is not a Victrola without the Victor dog. This trademark is on every Victrola. It guarantees the quality and protects you from inferior substitutes.

The word "Victrola" is also a registered trademark of the Victor Talking Machine Company. It is derived from the word "Victor" and designates the products of the Victor Company only.

As applied to sound-reproducing instruments, "Victrola" refers only to the instruments made by the Victor Company—the choice of the world's greatest artists.

Look inside the lid—insist upon seeing the famous Victor trademarks. On the portable styles which have no lid, the Victor trademark appears on the side of the cabinet.

Put Your "Creator"

IN LESS THAN ONE MINUTE, you can easily and quickly demonstrate to yourself that you are only half as dynamic, vital, well, strong, energetic, and vigorous, and that you are but half as authoritative, forceful, dominant, self-reliant, daring, and courageous, and that you are merely half as progressive, masterful, aroused, powerful, and creative as you may easily become through putting your "creator" to work for you—to create for you.

Only the "Supreme" Know the Pleasures of Supremacy

Everywhere intelligent and smart men and women, in every walk of life, are secretly and privately advancing themselves in life, happiness, joy, power, health, and personality, through consciously employing the principles of evolution, by compelling their "creators" to work for them, strive for them, plan for them, evolutionize for them, and create for them, and to give them better and more vital and energetic bodies, and more intense and conscious personalities.

Only the "Masterful" Know the Joys and Pleasures of Life

Whether you are a doctor, farmer, lawyer, laborer, banker or soldier, business man or sailor, philosopher or scientist, greater success is waiting for you, through compelling your internal "creator" to build, construct and create for you.

Only the "Vital" Know the Pleasures and Joys of Real Success

Mentally and physically, you are the result of blind evolution. You can amazingly advance yourself beyond your blind evolution through compelling your internal "creator" to create for you a better mind and personality, better brain, a better nervous system, a better digestive system, a better heart, better arteries, better lungs, better liver, better blood, better protoplasm, better every cell, tissue, gland, organ, and every part of your body, as well as a higher and more wide-awake and more able mind.

Only the "Mighty" Know the Pleasures of the Mighty

Your "creator" is ready to furnish you with higher power of mind and body, if you only make the demand in the way your internal "creator" understands and recognizes. Conscious Evolution uses the means and avenue through which the internal "creator" is reached positively, successfully, easily and conveniently, and without loss of time, compelling the internal "creator" to create for you just what you really desire, and really need, and really want. Your "creator" gives you the mind, the ideas, and the power to obtain what you want, if you activate your "creator" through the proper medium.

Only the "Evolutionarily Perfect" Know the Joys of the Conqueror

Why deny yourself the super-joys, the super-pleasures and the super-happiness? Why deny yourself the best there is in existence? Why deny yourself these advantages when they are so easily available, and when it is so absolutely certain that you can attain them? Why, in other

Conscious Evolution

Conscious Evolution must not be confused with Darwinian evolution or Physical Culture, nor should Conscious Evolution be confused with Hindoo philosophies, auto-suggestion, self-hypnosis, gymnastics, or mere physiology, anatomy, histology, theosophy, morphology, medicine, pathology, exercise, New Thought, Christian Science, calisthenics, embryology or psychology.

Conscious Evolution is not an occult science, nor a metaphysical science, nor a divine science, nor a spiritual science, nor a material science, nor is Conscious Evolution a symbolic science, nor a hoping, wishing, longing and dreaming philosophy.

Conscious Evolution must not be confused with any of the conceptually symbolic systems of the secondary and tertiary type, and Conscious Evolution cannot be comprehended in any of the present day concepts in science and philosophy, including the science of biology.

Conscious Evolution must not be confused with any present-day philosophies or sciences of a material or mental character.

Conscious Evolution cannot be understood by physicians, psychologists, physical culturists, philosophers, chemists, cosmologists or biologists of the present day.

Conscious Evolution is a new and original science, an exact science, a demonstrable science—a science of the evolution of and through Conscious Energy—a science of the Ultimate.

Conscious Evolution is the beginning of a new evolutionary era for the human race.

"I owe my rise from the position of a country insurance agent to virtual head of one of the largest insurance companies of the world entirely to the power of personality Conscious Evolution has given me."

"My weak will and personality for years made it possible for my business partners to rob me of my proper share of the profits. Conscious Evolution gave me courage, self-reliance and power of personality, and I made my partners pay me $160,000.00 out of which they had bulldozed me during my feeble and powerless days."

"I became aware of the beneficial power of Conscious Evolution at the end of the first ten seconds."

"What more can I say except to express my appreciation of your method and sincere thanks for your interest and co-operation? What more can one want for so little? What more does one get in this world?"

"Conscious Evolution has taken away that tired, lazy feeling and replaced it with a feeling of energy—a feeling to do something and to take an interest in doing it. Truly, Conscious Evolution is a wonderful discovery. My experience with it enables me to say that it is all that is claimed for it and more."

"I am happy to say that I received your instructions, and that in spite of traveling a good deal my health is remarkable at ninety years of age."

"Conscious Evolution made me feel twenty-five years younger. I can run up and down stairs, and walk six or seven miles at any time. I rest and digest as I did in my youth. I have no worry and I feel happy. My arms and legs are getting strong, and I thank your System for it all. I have got along so well, I constantly think of going into the shipyard, to see what I can do. I want to stir around at something even though I am eighty-three years of age. Conscious Evolution is bringing me back to life. Conscious Evolution is bringing me back to youth. And I thank you, Mr. Swoboda."

"I would not take fifty thousand dollars for the power which in six weeks Conscious Evolution has given me."

"I am certain I am gaining in every way, for I feel as full of 'fight' and energy as a wild cat."

"Problems that formerly worried me are now as easy as to seem almost unreal, since I gained power of personality through Conscious Evolution."

Swoboda
26 Years Ago

From a sickly youth Swoboda made of himself a magnificent physical specimen of the human race. This was just the beginning—his greater evolution was yet to come.

words, live the inferior life in preference to the superior—the genuinely successful life? Why cheat yourself of the advantages of life? Why deny yourself this super-energy, this super-power, and this super-activity of personality and mind, which is made easily and absolutely possible through progressive evolution—self-evolution—scientific evolution—personal evolution.

How to Gain What You Want

The way for you to gain what you want is by increasing your power of mind and body evolutionarily, so as to compel conditions to yield to your superior and irresistible energies. Conscious Evolution is the easy and sure means of making yourself supreme.

Why Be Satisfied with Inferior Life?

Why be satisfied or content with inferior vitality, inferior health, inferior energy, inferior digestion, inferior heart power, inferior lung power, inferior nervous system, inferior brain power, inferior memorizing power, inferior reasoning power, inferior sensing power, inferior scheming power, inferior business power, inferior conscious power, and inferior personal power? Why not attain the vital power of supremacy?

Swoboda To-day

A Remarkable Personality

Swoboda, himself, is perhaps the most perfect example of what Conscious Evolution can accomplish. As Swoboda gains in years, he grows younger in enthusiasm, younger in vitality, younger in health; he is becoming stronger, more energetic, more confident, more dominant and more alive by capitalizing his creative powers through Conscious Evolution. What Swoboda is accomplishing for himself, you too can accomplish—every individual can accomplish, for every individual is governed by the same laws and principles, and every individual has it within himself to make use of these laws and principles. Swoboda's mind and body are so alert and so active that in his presence one feels completely overpowered. His personality dominates everything with which it comes in contact; yet Swoboda is real!—there is absolutely nothing mysterious about him. He knows not what fatigue is—he is a tireless worker. He delights in making sick people well and weak people strong. He loves his work because he feels he is of benefit to humanity—making a better, more vital, more potent race of men and women. Swoboda is not only a mental superman, but a high-powered physical dynamo, an unheard of combination.

"A year ago I was down and out financially and physically. I was a wreck. Conscious Evolution gave me power of mind and health. I am to-day better than ever and I am more prosperous than ever. Naturally I am a believer in the Swoboda idea."

"Your system makes me feel like a different person. Every one whom I have ever met who has tried it out, has the same thing to say about it. Was talking to a man to-day whose wife is a Swoboda enthusiast."

"Your system is direct, simple, scientific, effective, and makes one feel so invigorated. As an athlete and a physician, I enforce Conscious Evolution unreservedly. It is, and more, what is claimed for it."

"Conscious Evolution has given me surprising results. I expected good results, but I am surprised."

"Conscious Evolution sent a message of energy, health, and power through me in twenty seconds, which has been increased from day to day."

"Your course has been of great benefit to me. I am able to do a great deal more work with less fatigue. My pleasures are also increased; all work seems a pleasure now."

"I indeed realize what physiological gladness means. My sensation of physical enjoyment is wonderful. It seems too good to be true. It is something as I felt when I took my first trip to Bermuda, where nature has combined the blending of dainty coloring so exquisite that nothing short of fairy land can describe it. This is how Conscious Evolution causes me to feel."

"I can honestly say that the benefits I have received from Conscious Evolution cannot be measured by any payment of money, and I can say unhesitatingly that your system far exceeded my fondest hopes."

"I could see the tremendous reality and possibilities of Conscious Evolution in less than half a minute's direction of my energies into creative channels."

"Conscious Evolution has changed me from an invalid into a tireless human machine."

"I would not consider trading the benefits I have received from Conscious Evolution for gold."

"As a student of physiology and histology, I at once recognized the feasibility of Conscious Evolution."

"Ten seconds from the time I started Conscious Evolution, I felt myself more alive and energetic."

"I have used Conscious Evolution for a few weeks, and I find myself marvellously improved in both body and mind. Conscious Evolution is wonderful, and the world will be brighter when men and women everywhere grasp it."

These Rare and Amazing Books Are For You

Swoboda has published for distribution two remarkable books which explain his system of Conscious Evolution and what it has already done. Write for these books—not because Conscious Evolution has meant so much to 262,000 other men and women, not because there is scarcely a prominent family in the country that hasn't at least one member a pupil of Swoboda, but because they contain valuable ideas for you. Conscious Evolution is being personally used by many of the most prominent physicians and such men as Woodrow Wilson, Charles E. Hughes, the Rockefellers, the Vanderbilts, the Goulds, the Huntingtons, the Cadahys, the Armours, the Swifts, and McAdoo for advancing themselves in energy, health, vitality and power of personality.

Write for these books, because they mean so much to YOU in multiplied living power, earning power and personal power. They are filled from cover to cover with the vital facts about yourself and how you can acquire the degree of power in body and mind that you so consciously or unconsciously desire. They explain the dangers of excessive deep breathing, excessive exercise, and excessive muscular development, also the fallacy of conscious control of physiological processes.

CONSCIOUS EVOLUTION and THE SCIENCE OF LIFE show how to double or even treble your power of mind and body; not by tedious, prolonged study, but by a process of energisation which raises the very level of your life and mental power.

CONSCIOUS EVOLUTION and THE SCIENCE OF LIFE supply the key to dominant personal power, dominant business power, dominant success power, dominant mental power and dominant will power.

They show how to change your aimless and fruitless life and attitudes into ambition, inspiration, enthusiasm and the higher success.

These books show how to amazingly increase your power of will and personality, as well as your power of body for every action, for every purpose and process.

Conscious Evolution is a new science, and no one can afford not to know at least the simple facts about it. These facts show how Conscious Evolution overcomes weak will, poor health, feebleness of mind and body.

They show how to overcome the inferior, pleasureless, feeble and unsatisfactory life by giving the means to the successful, superior and abundant life.

Conscious Evolution also shows how to arrest the aging of the body, and how to remain young, energetic, vigorous and active all the days of life.

These books are absolutely free and there is no obligation now or after. These books are yours to keep, that you may attain a higher understanding of yourself and of Evolution and the means to a higher existence.

Even if you gain but one idea or the realization of the one principle of life through CONSCIOUS EVOLUTION and THE SCIENCE OF LIFE, these books will be of eternal advantage to you.

Just write your name and address on the coupon, tear it out and mail it to Swoboda, or draw a ring around your name on your letterhead, or merely send a postal, giving your name and address. Do it to-day! This is your opportunity! Now is your turn! This is your day! This is your hour! Write now!

Cultivate your mind. Develop your literary gifts. Master the art of self-expression. Make your spare time profitable. Turn your ideas into dollars.

Dr. Esenwein

for many years editor of Lippincott's Magazine, and a staff of literary experts. Constructive criticism. Frank, honest, helpful advice. Real teaching.

One pupil has received over $5,000 for stories and articles written mostly in spare time—"play work," he calls it. Another pupil received over $1,000 before completing her first course. Another, a busy wife and mother, is averaging over $75 a week from playwriting alone.

There is no other institution or agency doing so much for writers, young or old. The universities recognize this, for over one hundred members of the English faculties of higher institutions are studying in our Literary Department. The editors recognize it, for they are constantly recommending our courses.

We publish The Writer's Library. We also publish The Writer's Monthly, especially valuable for its full reports of the literary market. Expedite our teaching service, we offer a manuscript criticism service.

FOUR HUNDRED YEARS AGO

On April 22 occurred the quadricentennial of the landing of Cortez into Mexico. With universal consent his eleven ships were broken to pieces. The influence of Cortez must have been unbounded to be able to persuade his men to an act unparalleled in history. Six hundred men voluntarily cut off their means of escape and shut themselves up in an unknown country filled with warlike people, whose mode of warfare spared their prisoners only for torture or sacrifice.

Soon he defeated, made peace with, and added six thousand Tlaxcalan warriors to his force. At Cholula his forces destroyed six thousand natives without the loss of a man. This town was only sixty miles from the capital of Mexico. The capture and death of Montezuma soon followed. On Lake Tezcuco Cortez launched the first navy on American waters, and the fall of the Aztec dynasty soon ensued.

Prescott says: "Yet we cannot regret the fall of an empire which did so little to promote the happiness of its subjects or the real interests of humanity. They had ruled over their wide domains with a sword instead of a scepter. The empire of the Aztecs did not fall before its time. Its fate may serve as a striking proof that a government which does not rest on the sympathies of its subjects cannot long abide; that human institutions when not connected with human prosperity and progress must fall. And who shall lament their fall?"

Buffalo, New York.

SEEKERS FIND

"One maw'nin', honey, dere was a genelman what I opened de gate for w'en he ride by on hawseback an' he t'rew me a dime wropped up in a bit er paper.

"I seen dat ar paper come open an' de dime roll along towa'ds de gutta, and I stooped myself down and looked for de dime on de groun'.

"Well, de genelman rode away, and I searched for de dime mos' ober de whole township, till I see de genelman comin' ridin' back in de afternoon. But dere wasn't no dime nor nothin' dere. Dere shore wasn't.

"Ses de genelman, 'Well, Uncle Remus, you fine dat bill yet?' I says, 'Thankee, Massa, for the dime. I didn't know you was goin' to send no bill of it.' The genelman stopped his hawse. 'Why, there it is right befo' your nose, Uncle Remus,' and sure nuff dar was a five-dollar bill, right in de middle of de road."

"But, Uncle Remus," said the little boy, "I thought you said there was nothing there. How was it you didn't find it when you looked for the dime?"

"So there wasn't, honey, so there wasn't. There's never nothin' for you what you ain't looking for."

BOLTON HALL.

The "East African Standard" describes a duel between a motor car and a lioness. The affair, it says, happened at night near Nairobi. The chauffeur noted a commotion in the bush near the road, then the gleaming eyes of an enraged wild animal. He accelerated his speed at the instant the lioness leaped. She struck the hood and was thrown far in advance of the car, whose wheels then passed over her. The dead lioness was finally loaded into the car and taken back to the town in triumph.

An Old Man at Fifty— A Young Man at Seventy

The Remarkable Story of Sanford Bennett, a Former San Francisco Business Man, Who Solved the Problem of Prolonging Youth

By V. O. SCHWAB

THERE is no longer any occasion to go hunting for the spring of Eternal Youth. What Ponce de Leon failed to discover in his world-famous mission, ages ago, has been brought to light right here in staid prosaic America by Sanford Bennett, a former San Francisco business man. He proved it, too, right in his own person. At 50 he was partially bald. At 70 he had a thick head of hair, although it was white. At 50 his eyes were weak. At 70 they were as strong as when he was a child. At 50, he was a worn-out, wrinkled, broken-down, decrepit old man. His cheeks were sunken, his face drawn and haggard, his muscles atrophied. Thirty years of chronic dyspepsia had resulted in catarrh of the stomach, with acid rheumatism periodically adding its agonies. At 70 he was in perfect health, a good deal of an athlete, and as young as the average man of 35. All this he has accomplished by some very simple and gentle exercises which he practiced for about ten minutes before arising in the morning. Yes, many of the exercises are taken in bed, peculiar as this may seem. As Mr. Bennett explains, his case was not one of preserving health, but one of rejuvenating a weak, middle-aged body into a robust old one, and he says what he has accomplished anyone can accomplish by the application of the same methods, and so it would seem. All of which puts the Dr. Osler theory to shame. There isn't room in this article to go into a lengthy description of youth and the prevention of old age. All this he tells himself in a book which he has written, entitled "Old Age—Its Cause and Prevention." This book is a complete history of himself and his experiences, and contains complete instructions for those who wish to put his health and youth-building methods to their own use. It is a book that every man and woman who is desirous of remaining young after passing the fiftieth, sixtieth, seventieth, and as Mr. Bennett believes, the one hundredth milestone of life, should read. It is a truly remarkable contribution to health-building literature and is especially valuable because it has been written in a practical manner by a practical man.

Keeping young is simply a matter of knowing how. If you have vitality enough to keep alive, then you have enough to keep young, to keep strong and to be active. Sanford Bennett proves it to you in this book. His message is new. The point of view is unique. The style is fascinating. The pictures are plentiful. The lesson of physical rejuvenation is irresistible. This is a book for every man and woman—young or old.

PARTIAL CONTENTS

Some idea of the field covered by the author may be gained by the following topics: Old Age, Its Cause; How to Prevent It; The Will in Exercising; Exercising in Bed—shown by fifteen pages of illustration. Sun, Fresh Air and Deep Breathing for Lung Development; The Secret of Good Digestion; Dyspepsia; How I Strengthened my Eyes; The Liver; Internal Cleanliness—how it removes and prevents constipation and its many attendant ills; External Cleanliness; Rheumatism; Varicose Veins in the Legs; The Hair; The Obese Abdomen; The Rejuvenation of the Face, Throat and Neck; The Skin, and many other experience chapters of vital interest.

DON'T SEND ANY MONEY

"Old Age—Its Cause and Prevention," with its 400 pages profusely illustrated and handsomely bound in cloth, contains as much material as many Courses of Instruction selling for $25 or more. But you can secure a copy of this book for only $3. Before committing yourself in any way, however, the publishers will send you "Old Age—Its Cause and Prevention" on approval without deposit. Sanford Bennett's system, as fully described and illustrated in his book, increases nerve force and nerve energy, benefiting every organ of the body—the brain included—by keeping the vertebrae of the spinal column young, flexible, elastic, and in perfect alignment. If, after examination in your own home, you feel you can afford to be without youth and health, send the book back within five days and you will owe nothing. If you decide to keep it, send your check for $3. There are no strings to this offer. No money is required in advance. Merely fill out and mail the coupon and by return post "Old Age—Its Cause and Prevention" will be sent to you at once.

MAIL COUPON

For having solved the problem of prolonging youth during life, the world owes Sanford Bennett a vote of thanks. Of course there are those who will scoff at the idea, but the real wise men and women among those who hear of Sanford Bennett, will most certainly investigate further and at least acquire a knowledge of his methods. This the publishers will allow you to do without cost or obligation, through their "send no money" offer. Mail the coupon below NOW. Address

Varnish your bathroom with Valspar—the waterproof varnish!

SPLASHES won't spot it; puddles of hot, soapy water won't turn it white; even scalding steam won't injure Valsparred woodwork.

For Valspar is positively waterproof!

But don't stop at the bathroom—use Valspar everywhere around the house. Wherever you have woodwork you need Valspar to protect and preserve it. You can easily apply it yourself.

Use Valspar—

—on floors and woodwork.

—on front hall and stairs where wet shoes and dripping umbrellas quickly ruin ordinary varnish.

—on the front door and on all window sills for protection against rain and snow.

—on linoleum, congoleum and oilcloths. It's wonderful how Valspar will brighten and add to the life of such floor-coverings.

THE TROUBLED PEACE CONFERENCE

FEW periods during the whole session of the Peace Conference have been so critical and difficult as that comprising the last eight days of April.

In those eight days occurred the issuance of President Wilson's ultimatum to Italy concerning Fiume and Dalmatia; the consequent threat of the disruption of the Peace Conference by the retirement of Italy; renewed presentation of the difficulties involved in the relations of Japan to the Peace Conference with reference to China; the arrival of the vanguard of the German peace delegation at Versailles; the presentation of the report on international labor legislation; the publication of the arraignment of the Kaiser; and the adoption by the plenary Conference of the revised Covenant of the League of Nations.

That the controversy over the question of Fiume and Dalmatia broke out in public at the very time when the advance guard of the German delegation was coming to Versailles is due probably to the fact that it was no longer possible to continue the discussion of this question behind closed doors with the date for the conclusion of the drafting of the peace treaty approaching so near.

THE FIUME-DALMATIAN DISPUTE

Elsewhere in this issue we give an account of the parties to the Fiume-Dalmatian dispute and the questions involved in it, and on another page discuss the bearing of this dispute, and particularly the President's ultimatum, upon the project for a League of Nations.

Exactly what happened to bring about a crisis over this question is a subject of disagreement. Just at the time when it was reported that the Italian delegates were prepared to make some compromise on their claims in the Adriatic, there was published here, as well as in Paris, a statement by President Wilson in which he declared himself and America as opposed to the assigning of Fiume to Italy and also opposed to the arrangement for the assignment of territory to Italy on the Dalmatian coast.

The President's statement was in brief as follows: Italy's arrangement with England and France upon entering the war is no longer valid because the circumstances have changed. New Powers have entered the war. Austria-Hungary has ceased to exist, and some of the constituent parts of Austria-Hungary are now associated with the Allies. It is the business of the Peace Conference to protect these newcomers as well as the more powerful states and to make peace according to the "clearly defined principles" which he had enunciated when America entered the war. According to these principles Fiume cannot be assigned to Italy, and according to these principles also there is no further strategic reason for assigning Dalmatian territory to Italy. The President concluded his statement with an appeal to Italy to be magnanimous and to assume a leadership in the new order of Europe.

The Prime Minister of Italy, Vittorio Orlando, head of the Italian Peace Delegation, at once declared that it was impossible to continue participating in the Peace Conference because the President's statement was an appeal to the Italian people over his head, and that he could not continue negotiations until he had gone to Italy and ascertained whether this appeal against the Italian Government was or was not to be indorsed by the Italian people. He and his associate, Signor Sonnino, thereupon went to Italy and were received by an ovation in which all elements of the population united. Accompanied with this ovation were expressions adverse to President Wilson but not to the American people. Apparently the effect of the President's appeal has been to strengthen the Orlando Government very greatly.

INTERNATIONAL LABOR PROPOSALS

While these disputatious matters were under discussion at the Conference, there was published one of the most important of the reports that have been prepared during the Peace Conference. This is the report of the Commission on International Labor Legislation. The subject with which it deals is of concern to a vast proportion of the population of the world and bears directly upon the chief problems following the war. It is possible here to consider only one point in that report.

It is proposed that labor legislation suggested by the Annual Labor Conference of the League of Nations shall be submitted to each nation separately, and that such measures as are recommended be submitted within a year to the national legislature or other competent authority of every member of the League. There is of course no power that can compel the adoption of such legislation, and there is no proposal, as we understand it, to make conditions of labor a subject for international action. Any such proposal would be impracticable.

It would seem perhaps at first sight that the plan of the Commission for International Labor Legislation provided for nothing that was not available now; but a little more careful consideration will show that the plan has great possibilities of usefulness.

At present there is no means by which standards for conditions of labor that are universally regarded as desirable can be formulated in a way to make a world-wide impression; and certainly no arrangement exists by which measures that have the approval of the working people of the world can be brought authoritatively before the various national parliaments. Now, by this plan, conditions of hardship affecting large numbers of people will be studied, and remedies proposed; and the recommendations made will have the support of a public opinion of international extent.

THE KAISER TO BE TRIED

Largely counterbalancing the rather discouraging reports concerning some other matters in the Peace Conference comes the announcement of the proposed articles for the arraignment of the Kaiser.

There has been in the Peace Conference a difference of opinion concerning the action that ought to be taken against those responsible for the war or for the offenses against humanity perpetrated during the war. According to one view there was no law or authority under which the German High Command could be held accountable. Those holding this view argued that the very purpose of the arraignment of the Kaiser would be to uphold law, and if action were taken without authority of law, it would be a violation of the alleged object of the action. Therefore, it was argued, any criminal action should be taken by individual nations in whose territory plain and clear violations of law occurred.

According to the other view, there is a public law of nations, partly embodied in treaties and in written agreements, but also equally validly embodied in custom and practice. Those who hold this view regard it as important that if this public law of nations is to remain valid, international action should be taken avowedly under that international common law.

It is evident that in the Commission charged with investigating responsibility for the war and in the Council of Four the second view has prevailed, for the very first of the articles submitted to the plenary Conference by the Council of Four arraigns William II of Hohenzollern, "not for an offense against criminal law, but for a supreme offense against international morality and the sanctity of treaties."

It is therefore proposed that Holland be asked to surrender the former Emperor, and that the German Government be required to hand over to the Allied and associated Powers persons accused of having committed acts in violation of the laws and customs of war, and to undertake to furnish all documents and information of every kind necessary to insure knowledge of the incriminating acts, discovery of the offenders, and "the just appreciation of the responsibility."

There is nothing which the Peace Conference has to do more important than to carry out the provisions of these articles.

THE NEW COVENANT OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

Like a wise statesman, President Wilson has changed his mind regarding the proposed plan of a League of Nations. On March 4 at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York City, in advocating the adoption of the first draft, he said:

I must say that I have been puzzled by some of the criticisms—not by the criticisms themselves—I can understand them perfectly even when there was no foundation for them—but by the fact of the criticism. I cannot imagine how these gentlemen can live and not live in the atmosphere of the world. . . . I have heard no counsel of generosity in their criticism. I have heard no constructive suggestion.

From the same platform and on the same occasion Mr. Taft said that he welcomed the criticisms, that some of them were constructive, and that debate and discussion would undoubtedly improve the Covenant of the League. Mr. Wilson has now come to Mr. Taft's view, and the result is that the Covenant has been amended and some of the suggestions which on March 4 the President felt were not constructive have now with his approval been incorporated into the revised version. In the amended version of the Covenant issued last week by the Paris Conference there has been some rearrangement of language and some clarification of expression. The vital and important additions or modifications are as follows:

1. The Monroe Doctrine is specifically recognized.
2. The right of member nations to withdraw from the League on two years' notice is stated.
3. Purely domestic questions are not to come within the sphere of the League's decisions or control.

4. No nation is to be made a trustee or "mandatory" for colonial administration without its consent.

5. New nations in addition to the original members may be admitted to the League by a two-thirds vote of the Assembly (formerly called the House of Delegates), provided such new nations give effective guarantees of their intention and capacity to conform to the principles and regulations of the League.

6. In order that decisions of the League may be made effective (except in cases of procedure, administration, and the admission of new members) they must be adopted by unanimous vote.

In addition to these specific amendments the new covenant names Geneva, Switzerland, as the capital of the League, and states that the following nations are the original or charter members of the League:

United States of America, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, British Empire, Canada, Australia, South Africa, New South Wales, India, China, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, France, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Hedjaz, Honduras, Italy, Japan, Liberia, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, Poland, Portugal, Rumania, Serbia, Siam, Uruguay; and adds that these States have been invited to become members, namely:

Argentine Republic, Chile, Colombia, Denmark, Netherlands, Norway, Paraguay, Persia, Salvador, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Venezuela.

A significant thing about these lists is that Mexico is neither an original nor invited member of the League. Whether this is because the charter members do not regard Mexico as having at present a sufficiently stable government, or whether it is because the Carranza Administration has recently and publicly denounced the Monroe Doctrine, we do not know. Whatever the reason, Mexico is at the present moment in an unenviable position. The omission of her name from this world-wide organization is a conclusive answer to those who have felt that criticisms of the Carranza Government are prejudiced and unjustifiable.

AMERICAN OPINION ON THE LEAGUE

The general amendments to the Covenant will, we think, be approved in the United States. They embody the important constructive suggestions made by such men as Mr. Taft, Mr. Hughes, and Mr. Root, already fully reported in these columns. They will doubtless meet the sincere objections of those Senators who felt that the original form of the Covenant did not sufficiently guarantee the National initiative and National authority of the United States. The amendments do not, however, mollify the antagonism of such irreconcilables as Senator Borah, Senator Reed, and the New York "Tribune." The "Tribune," in a very pessimistic editorial, thinks the whole thing is hopeless. It calls Article X (which guarantees member nations against territorial aggression or conquest) "iniquitous," and Senator Borah says it is a "breeder of war." The New York "Tribune" says that the Monroe Doctrine amendment "is plainly a fraud," and Senator Borah calls it "inadequate and inappropriate." Senator Reed says of the modified Covenant that, "on the whole, the document is worse than originally drawn."

We do not think these pessimistic views, however, are representative either of the Senate or of the country at large. Our own judgment is that, after an appropriate amount of discussion, the Senate will probably ratify the amended Covenant.

But intelligent men and women at home and abroad will not imagine that even a ratification by the United States Senate and the opening of the League's offices in Geneva are immediately going to bring about a millennium. The proposed League is a hopeful experiment, and we believe one worth trying. Its success or failure at the outset depends, if not wholly, at least in a very important respect, upon the character and ability of the appointees made to the two administrative bodies—the Assembly and the Council.

The first Secretary-General has already been named. He is Sir Eric Drummond, of Great Britain, well known in English official life, although not a man of international reputation. He has since 1900 held various responsible positions in the British Foreign Office and is at present private secretary to Mr. Balfour, Minister of Foreign Affairs. He is therefore thoroughly familiar with diplomatic procedure and administration.

THE BOLSHEVIKI ON THE DEFENSIVE

Those who believe in the ultimate unity and freedom of Russia have been greatly encouraged by the reports last week of military successes on the part of the troops of the Omsk and co-operating Governments. Admiral Kolchak's Government, which has its seat at Omsk and controls Siberia, has evidently succeeded in organizing an army of considerable military efficiency. Its troops have been moving westward, and incidentally the Bolsheviki in the Archangel section are threatened with being cut off. That will simplify the situation in Archangel, where our troops have been all winter and from which they are now being withdrawn. It is said that the Czechoslovak and Allied forces have had no part in the western advance against the Bolsheviki. This means that the Omsk Government has become strong enough to carry on its operations unaided. Undoubtedly this fact will greatly strengthen the movement for formal recognition of the Omsk Government by the Allied Powers.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL BURLESON

The dissatisfaction throughout the country with the policies and methods of the Postmaster-General has become something more than a tempest in a teapot. Although fighting has ceased, the war is not technically over, and Mr. Burleson is therefore managing the telegraph and telephone systems of the country, as well as the transportation of mail, under war legislation which is still in effect. For the first time in the history of the telephone, we believe, a State-wide strike was declared in Massachusetts. It was so serious and got so far beyond the control of Mr. Burleson that the State officials of Massachusetts asked if the management of the telephone in that State could not be delegated to them. It has now been settled by granting all the demands of the employees. Why the demands were not granted in the first place by Mr. Burleson without going through all the turmoil of a strike has not yet been explained.

There has been very general complaint that the efficiency of the Post Office has deteriorated. The last straw appears to have been laid upon the back of a suffering public by the suppression of some news telegrams offered for transmission by the New York "World." These telegrams contained criticisms of Postmaster-General Burleson, and the Western Union Telegraph Company would not accept them. The Postmaster-General now says that the suppression was done without his knowledge or approval, under a regulation which existed in the days of private management. It appears that there was a regulation against libelous matter; but criticism of public officials has not, until the present war period, been considered even by the telegraph companies as libel.

Mr. Burleson has issued a tu quoque statement saying that the general criticism of his course is due to a conspiracy of the newspaper and periodical publishers, who object to the higher second-class rates and the zone system of postage, which he has advocated and introduced. He even goes further and attempts to shift the responsibility for the present unsatisfactory second-class regulations to the shoulders of ex-Justice Hughes, who, he says, as chairman of a special commission, advocated an increase of second-class rates. He implies that advertising has become such a feature of American newspapers and periodicals as to be a detriment instead of a benefit to the public.

In this connection it is a little interesting to note that his fellow Cabinet member, Secretary Wilson, of the Department of Labor, has issued a proclamation publicly urging American merchants and manufacturers to advertise, and saying that advertising is a public service.

It may be said in reply that the majority of newspaper and periodical publishers in this country do not oppose an increase of second-class rates if that is necessary to meet proper expenses. What they object to is the zone system of postage, which promotes sectionalism.

The chief dissatisfaction with the present administration of the Post Office Department has reached such a pitch that some influential members of Mr. Burleson's own political party have asked for his resignation. In contending that he has been a failure as a public official it is not necessary to prove that his administration of the mails, the telegraph, or the telephone has been either unjust or inefficient. His principles and theories may be as philosophically right as a mathematical demonstration, but the fact still remains that he has got the country by the ears and has created everywhere a sense of extreme irritation. One of the important functions of a Cabinet officer is to manage the country as well as manage his own Department. No matter how upright the general manager of a corporation may be, if he irritates his workmen so that they strike, his office employees so that they cannot do their best work, and his customers so that they dislike to deal with the company, the President and Board of Directors are pretty likely to ask for his resignation.

AN APPROPRIATE ROOSEVELT MEMORIAL

A committee of women of the city of New York, whose work, beginning modestly, has now attained the dignity of a National movement, proposes to buy the birthplace of Theodore Roosevelt at 28 East Twentieth Street, New York, and the adjoining property, 26 East Twentieth Street, for the purpose of establishing a permanent Roosevelt memorial in the city of his birth. The house No. 28 will be restored so as to appear as nearly as possible as it did in Colonel Roosevelt's boyhood. He describes the house and his life in it in a very readable chapter of his autobiography. It is proposed to make this particular building a sort of Roosevelt Museum, with memorabilia and objects of various kinds closely associated with the life of this great citizen of the State of New York. But it will be much more than a museum, for, with the adjoining house, it is proposed to make it a center of Americanization and citizenship. The Woman's Roosevelt Memorial Association is endeavoring to raise a fund of a million dollars, not merely for the purchase of the property, but to provide an endowment by means of which the two buildings composing Roosevelt House may be made, to use their own words, a center of citizenship activities, a living thing, a place where the boys and the girls of America—and the men and women as well, foreign born and native alike—will come together in citizenship activities, in order that their understanding of America may become deeper and keener, and in order that the great ideal of practical service to our country, of indefatigable activity in its behalf, shall stir and move with vivid power all Americans that frequent or visit "Roosevelt House."

The Association deserves success, and as it is composed of some of the most active and influential women of the city, who are going about their work in a practical and efficient way, it doubtless will succeed. Its purposes have the approval of members of the Roosevelt family. Those interested are invited to write to the Woman's Roosevelt Memorial Association, care of the New York Trust Company, 1 East Fifty-seventh Street, New York City. Full information about the project will be sent in reply.

THIRTY-SEVEN NEIGHBORHOOD HOUSES UNITE

Thirty-seven neighborhood houses in New York City, including the College, Henry Street, Union, and University Settlements, Greenwich House, Madison House, and the Hudson Guild, have formed a union to act for all of them and to increase their influence. The office of the new organization, known as the United Neighborhood Houses of New York, is at 289 Madison Avenue, and this is to be made the center of information about the work of settlements and community houses throughout New York.

Its plans include an appeal to city, State, and National authorities in cases where action is necessary to safeguard the public health, effort to promote improvement in public education, and work along lines which will make for the comfort, convenience, and good order of the community. A labor arbitration service is contemplated, and legislation is to be asked for and pressed. The constitution of the new organization provides that it may take steps to create a favorable public sentiment upon any matter falling within the sphere of activity of community houses.

The officers of the United Neighborhood Houses are: President, Mrs. Mary Kingsbury Simkhovitch; Vice-Presidents, Judge Thomas C. T. Crain, Mrs. Cyrus Sulzberger, and Mrs. Max Morgenthau, Jr. Among the members on the Service Committee, which will be concerned with the administration of this organization, are Professor Stephen P. Duncan, Mrs. Henry P. Davison, Adolph Lewisohn, and Mrs. Henry Morgenthau. The Council will consist of five representatives from each settlement, including directors of the institution, workers, and spokesmen for the people of the neighborhood.

The war-time period demonstrated the admirable work which the settlement houses are fitted to do. Owing to their close contact with the people in their respective neighborhoods, they were appealed to for help by the Red Cross, the Fuel Administration, the Food Board, the United War Work Campaign, and various other organizations interested in Americanization. This brought forcibly to the attention of the settlements their vast responsibility and opportunity, and determined them to form such an organization as would enable them to broaden the scope of their work and put it upon a sounder basis.

With an enlarged neighborhood programme it has been proposed that a public health service be installed, whereby the city may be divided and health centers established to help in carrying out health propaganda and education. A club service; an arbitration board, whose object should be to assist in the impartial arbitration of labor disputes; the extension of the co-operative movement to a scheme covering the industrial neighborhoods of the city—these and many other instrumentalities, such as household economics service, Americanization, hospital social service, etc., are being considered.

THE MUSIC SCHOOL SETTLEMENT

The audience that came to Aeolian Hall, New York City, recently, to enjoy some good music were not disappointed in their anticipation. The occasion of the gathering was the twenty-fifth annual Spring Festival Concert of the Music School Settlement of 55 East Third Street. The success of the concert was evident from the enthusiastic applause which the players of the various numbers received.

The Music School Settlement has four orchestras—the Elementary, the Junior, Senior, and Community Orchestras. Two of these took part in the festival, the Elementary Orchestra, conducted by Miss Fannie Levine, and the Senior Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Melzar Chaffee. The accomplishment and playing of these orchestras was a pleasant surprise to some who attended one of these Music School concerts for the first time. The music selected—by Bach, Beethoven, Grieg, and others—was well adapted to the ability of the pupils, who apparently enjoyed the concert as much as their interested friends. One little girl about ten years old, much to the amusement of some of the audience, kept time with her little feet while her hands were engaged with her violin—a similar desire to do so being felt by some of her elders, which good form forbade them to indulge. The programme was concluded by the singing of "America" by the audience and the pupils.

The Music School Settlement is doing a unique and commendable work. A thousand children of various races pass in and out of this settlement school, and the teachers, a hundred in number, through their patience and self-sacrifice thus call forth from these young people the songs, so to speak, of many lands, which are enriching what we may call America's music. A love of music is the basis of the school, but its work is by no means confined to musical technique. Its influence is cultural, social, and ethical in the broadest sense.

Like all growing philanthropic undertakings, the need of funds increases with the growth. Those connected with the Music School Settlement would like to enlist the patronage of interested music lovers financially well equipped. A little circular issued by them states that one thousand dollars will endow a scholarship, fifty dollars will give a child a scholarship for one year, and for one hundred dollars the giver will become an "Annual Patron." Checks may be sent to Frank H. Simmons, Music School Settlement, 55 East Third Street, New York. All praise and help are due the men and women in this work of placing in the possession of these young people the golden key of music which will open to them the doors of the other fine things of the soul.

WHAT A HOTEL-KEEPER THINKS OF "BOOZE"

One of the most interesting letters of the many we have received on the prohibition question is the following from the proprietor of an excellent hotel in one of the largest cities of New York State:

The other day I had luncheon with one of the greatest tobacco merchants of this country of ours. It was the day after the "booze" election in Michigan. If you recollect, a hotel-keeper was quoted as saying that the "Drys" had carried the election by fraud and the returns were false; my friend the tobacco merchant quoted this hotel man. I sent for the copy of your esteemed periodical containing "Keeping Detroit on the Water Wagon" [The Outlook for April 2] and read him what the Governor of Michigan, the Mayor of Detroit, and the Chief of Police of Detroit had to say on the subject. When I had finished, he said, "I am sold," indicating that I had made my point. The inclosed clipping [embodying a statement in the New York "Times" from the Association Opposed to National Prohibition, which describes an alleged crime wave in the District of Columbia after it went "bone dry"] is so manifestly unfair that it almost requires no answer, but the pro-German brewers and the distillers (German, Hebrew, and American) are making a desperate effort to save a business which through their grasping greed has brought the pleasures of alcohol down to the lowest possible point of degradation. When the social glass might have been served to us under proper regulations and restraint, they have dashed it from our lips.

I sell "booze"; it is part of the hotel business. I make a good profit and take a certain pleasure out of it, but I do not believe that the intelligence of Americans should be insulted by any such false impression as the anti-prohibition crowd desires to leave. Yes, crime is on the increase everywhere, but I have no doubt that it is less in Washington, D. C., than it is in cities of similar size where booze is sold and the saloon runs rampant.

In conclusion, I am not a prohibitionist, I am an Anti-Saloon Leaguer. I believe firmly that nature and nature's God has given the world all through the centuries alcohol in some form for the good of the world, but the American saloon cannot exist longer. It is a menace to health, public safety, and good citizenship, and I believe some time in the future we will return to our cups, but not under the present system.

HOTEL-KEEPER.

We know our correspondent and his hotel and believe he speaks as a competent and sincere witness of the folly of the liquor-saloon supporters who are now posing as defenders of beer and light wines.

A GOOD EXAMPLE

As a former Governor-General of Canada, and through his recent visit with Lady Aberdeen to the United States on a semi-official war mission, the Marquis of Aberdeen is well known to the American people. An article by him on his grandfather is to be found in this issue.

The Aberdeen "Free Press" gives an interesting account of Lord Aberdeen's action in parting with a considerable proportion of his great estate in the north of Scotland. About thirteen thousand acres of the lands within which Haddo House stands will be retained. The rest of it—about thirty-seven thousand acres—are to be sold, with the approval of his heirs and with the sanction of the Court, whose sanction, as we understand it, is necessary.

What is especially interesting in this incident is the fact that the new proprietor "intends to give an opportunity for all the tenants" on the lands which have been sold "to become owners of their holdings." If, as we judge to be the case, this purpose of the new proprietor has been one of the inducements which has led to the sale, Lord Aberdeen's action is a significant and valuable example for men of wealth in both countries to follow. If we are to meet successfully the great peril to civilization threatened by the Bolshevik movement, those who possess both intelligence and wealth must co-operate in a movement for a better distribution of both intelligence and wealth—of intelligence by a system of free education, including industrial education, and of wealth by just such measures as are being taken in connection with and really as a part of the sale of so large a portion of the Aberdeen estate. If the leveling which is sure to take place in the present reconstruction period is directed by the higher and better elements in society, it will be a leveling up; if it is not so directed, it will be under the control of the unscrupulous and the unintelligent, as it is now in Russia, and it will be a leveling down.

FIUME AND THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

PRESIDENT WILSON startled the world by a statement given out on April 23 respecting the controversy between Yugoslavia and Italy, a statement which, with apparently good reason, has been regarded as in effect an ultimatum. In this statement he presents the arguments in support of the claims of Yugoslavia, but not the arguments in support of the claims of Italy; and he assumes the right to decide the question at issue between these two peoples. That issue was briefly defined in The Outlook for January 15. We define it more fully on another page, and give to our readers the arguments used by the advocates both of Italy and of Yugoslavia.

A far more important issue to the world has, however, been raised by President Wilson's action.

A League of Nations, however ingeniously framed, would be of little use if any nation could at any time issue an ultimatum which the other nations must accept or see the League dissolved; and it would be of no use if any representative of a nation, acting on his own authority and without consultation with his own government, could issue such an ultimatum. This is what President Wilson has done. The Council of Four has not accepted his view of the question whether the city of Fiume should be put under Croatian or Italian control. The American people are not well informed on this question. The discussions which have taken place in the Council have not been reported to them. Their knowledge on the subject is derived from vague, unauthorized, and often contradictory rumors. No pains have been taken to give accurate information even to our Senators and Representatives. And the President, without consulting with them, and without reporting the arguments against his position, without even reporting the facts on which action must be based, has notified the Powers that no other view than his can America regard as consistent with the principles for which she has fought and upon which only she can consent to make peace. "The compulsion is upon her to square every decision she takes a part in with those principles. She can do nothing else."

This document Italy evidently, the other Powers apparently, have taken as America's ultimatum. Possibly Italy may modify her claims in the Adriatic rather than risk the withdrawal of America from the Peace Conference; but an agreement, even should one be obtained by a surrender of what her people evidently regard as a just and necessary claim, upon such a demand coming from what is probably now the wealthiest and most powerful nation on the globe does not augur well for future international peace by amicable diplomacy or judicial arbitration.

Jugoslavia as a state does not yet exist. It is a nation in the womb. What its boundary lines are to be, and what its international status, are yet to be determined. If it is impossible to settle by conciliation or compromise, or, conciliation and compromise failing, by arbitration, the question what shall be the boundaries of an unborn state whose very existence depends upon the will of the World Powers, and whose protection depends on the good will of its neighbors, there is no question which can be so settled. If one Power may enforce its own judgment upon so complicated and difficult a problem as that which is presented by what is miscalled the Fiume question, the democracy of nations is still hardly so much as a hope, hardly more than a dream.

It is affirmed and it is denied that the President's statement had before its issuance the approval of Clemenceau and Lloyd George, and the affirmative report and the denial are apparently of equal authority. The President's statement is interpreted by some as an address to the people of Italy over the heads of its official representatives, by others as an explanation to the people of America of their representative's action; but there is nothing in the document itself to indicate to whom the President addressed it. If he hoped by his appeal to win the sympathies of the Italian people for the settlement which he proposes, he must by this time have abandoned his hope. The union of Italy in support of the Italian claims as formulated by its representatives in Paris appears to be substantially unanimous.

Paris to report to his constituents at home, Italy has not withdrawn from the Conference. At this writing we are not without hope that wiser counsels may yet prevail and that some compromise may be found that will allay the irritation which the prolongation of this dispute has excited in both peoples. It is of the utmost importance to the whole civilized world, not only that Italy and Yugoslavia, but that the Latin and the Slavic races, should be true and loyal friends in defending civilization against the perils which formerly threatened from the autocracy of the kings and which now threaten from the dictatorship of the mob.

WHAT THE WORLD OWES GERMANY

WHAT does a community owe the criminal?

It does not owe him food and clothing and shelter. It may supply him those necessities as incidental means to an end, but not as part of its debt to him.

It does not owe him expressions of sympathy and affection. It may have sympathy for him, and even affection; but whatever feelings it has are the natural product of its humane spirit, not a part of its debt.

It does not owe him any effort to relieve him of the painful consequences of his crime. Some of those consequences are material, some are spiritual. They may involve loss of property. The community does not owe it to the criminal to make good any of that loss. They may involve the incurring of distrust on the part of his fellow-men. The community may put the criminal into the way of earning a renewal of faith in him; but it does not owe it to the criminal to try to re-establish that faith for him.

The first duty of the community is not to the criminal. It is protection of the law-abiding citizens from future crimes and reparation to the law-abiding citizens by the criminal for past crimes.

To the criminal, however, it has a duty also. It owes to him such a course of discipline that he and those who are in his frame of mind will acquire, if possible, first, a motive to make such restitution as is in his power; and, second, if possible, an adequate sense of his guilt and a resolve not to repeat his crimes in the future.

It is not vindictiveness on the part of the community that leads it to such a course of treatment for the criminal; it is, rather, an intelligent sense of justice, and of its own duty.

In the community of nations, Germany is in the position of the criminal.

Undoubtedly Germany is suffering from a lack of food and clothing and other necessities; but that fact does not make it a part of the debt of the civilized world to Germany to supply her with those needs. Possibly as a means to an end, and as the result of a laudable humane instinct, it may be desirable to send her food and other things. Even for criminals in prison the community provides food, clothing, and shelter, but only as a part of the course of discipline to which it subjects them. Elsewhere in this issue are two articles describing conditions in Germany. In one article the under-nourishment of a large part of the German population is ascribed to lack of sufficient food supplies; in the other it is attributed to conditions of transportation, and the unwillingness of multitudes of Germans to work. It is not vindictiveness to say that it is not the duty of the Allies to Germany to supply the shortage of food, or to improve the transportation, or to supply the lack of labor. The world does not owe Germany the necessities of life.

Undoubtedly there is misery in Germany, as there is misery normally among criminals. But that fact does not make it a part of the debt of the world to express sympathy and affection for the Germans. The world may pity those who are suffering the evil effects of what they have done, but its feeling is the natural instinct, not a part of the world's debt or an essential in the fulfillment of the world's duty.

Undoubtedly Germany is suffering and will long suffer from the material and spiritual consequences of the crime she has perpetrated—loss of property, loss of the world's esteem. It is not vindictiveness to say that it is no part of the world's duty to make good that loss to Germany.

What the world owes to Germany is what the community owes to the criminal. But what the civilized world owes to Germany cannot be adequately considered apart from what the world owes the community of nations. The first duty is to the law-abiding and peace-loving nations—a duty to compel Germany to repair as far as she can do so the wrongs she has perpetrated, and to protect the rest of the world from the repetition of similar crimes. No spirit of pity or compassion for Germany or the German people should prevent the world from fulfilling this duty.

Its duty to Germany as a criminal nation is such treatment as will, if possible, make the German people realize the crimes they have committed, realize the indignation of the civilized world against them because of those crimes, come to a sense of their own guilt and shame, and so provide Germany with a motive strong enough to impel her to undertake all possible reparation for past crimes and to recognize in all her future relations the rights of other peoples.

That is not a vindictive peace; it is the only possible just peace.

The French see this perhaps more clearly than any other people. That may be in part because they are where they have lasting proofs of the crime Germany committed; but it is also in part because the French, even in war and after war, think clearly and logically.

What ought to be done to Germany will not be altogether pleasant for the Germans. Those who do what ought to be done will not be wholly popular with the Germans. That makes no difference. It may involve trouble for the world and further expense. That is not decisive. Does the world owe it to Germany? If so, the debt ought to be paid.

CAN THE CHURCHES GET TOGETHER?

THAT a union of all the Christian forces in the Nation is very desirable is no longer doubted by any considerable number of thoughtful followers of Jesus Christ; but they differ respecting the method best adapted for this purpose. One group seeks to find a common creed upon which all can agree and a common organization in which all can unite. For this purpose, as heretofore reported in our columns, a number of Episcopal and Congregational clergymen have combined in a proposal to make such changes in the canons of the Episcopal Church that an Episcopal bishop can conscientiously give ordination to non-Episcopal clergymen, and non-Episcopal clergymen can conscientiously accept such ordination.

The other method proposes to leave the creeds, rituals, and ecclesiastical organizations of the various Churches unchanged, and to secure co-operation in Christian work without making any changes in or interfering with the liberty of the several Church organizations. The most striking and most promising phase of this method is that afforded by the Interchurch World Movement of North America.

What is proposed by this movement is not union but co-operation; not that any organization shall merge with any other organization or surrender any of its distinctive features, any of its liberties, any of its convictions, or even any of its prejudices. The movement simply proposes co-operation in procuring information respecting world needs and in obtaining funds for supplying those needs; but "each organization will maintain its own treasury and regulate its own affairs as heretofore."

An Interboard Conference was called to be held at Cleveland, Ohio, at this time—April 30–May 1—to promote this movement. Its specific objects are to interpret and strengthen the movement, to study the problems of the Christian Church, first, in our own Nation in the present era of reconstruction and social unrest; second, in its new world responsibility and opportunity; and, third, to seek out the best method of assembling and using effectively the Christian forces of America in the Christian service to which all followers of Jesus Christ are summoned at this time.

There are two reasons why Christian Co-operation appears to us a much more hopeful method than Church Union for securing efficiency in Christian work.

Historically the chief obstacles to the union of all Christians in Christian work have been compulsory creeds, compulsory rituals, and compulsory forms of church organization. That all men should think alike respecting the intellectual problems involved in religion is neither desirable nor possible. That they should all find the same symbols equally fitted to express the religious emotions of different temperaments is also neither possible nor desirable. And while it is conceivable that they might all agree upon one form of church government, it is certain that such an agreement, though it might give union, would not give liberty; and liberty and union are as desirable in the Church as in the Nation. Philosophy, therefore, would lead us to expect that Church Union would not be attained by the adoption of the same creed, the same ritual, and the same form of organization.

And history confirms the conclusion to which philosophy points us. Calvinists and Methodists, Episcopalians and Congregationalists, Baptists and Pedo-Baptists, have united in Christian work in the Y. M. C. A. and the Y. W. C. A., while they have retained their separate creeds, rituals, and church organizations; and the possibility of Christian co-operation has been still more emphasized by the Red Cross, in the work of which organization thousands have taken part who possessed the spirit of Christ though they did not call themselves Christians.

These grounds for hopefulness in the success of this Interchurch World Movement are still further confirmed by the fact that nearly forty Church organizations, representing nearly all the Protestant Evangelical denominations in the United States, have already taken favorable action concerning this movement for co-operation in Christian activity.

Any reader who desires further information concerning this movement can doubtless obtain it by writing to the Interchurch World Movement of North America, 111 Fifth Avenue, New York City, inclosing stamp for reply.

THE FIUME-DALMATIAN DISPUTE

THE controversy between the Italians and the Yugoslavs, in which President Wilson's espousal of the Yugoslavs' cause has brought the Peace Conference to the gravest crisis, has been simmering in Paris for many weeks. At one time the Yugoslavs proposed that the question be left to the decision of President Wilson; but the Italians declined the proposal, saying that to accept it would be an admission that the Peace Conference itself was incapable of deciding the very questions which it was called together to settle and an acknowledgment that the Entente Allies could not act together. Now, by the turn of events and by the issuance of his statement, the President is placed in the position of deciding the question as an unchosen arbitrator. To this controversy there are two parties, and in it are involved two questions.

The two parties are Italy and Yugoslavia. The two questions involved in the disposal, respectively, are Fiume, a port on the Adriatic, and the coast and coastal islands of Dalmatia, across the Adriatic from the eastern coast of Italy.

THE PARTIES TO THE CONTROVERSY

On both sides of the controversy are peoples who fought for the Allied cause; but on one side there are also peoples who belonged to one of the Central Empires, and some of them fought to the last against the Allies.

Italy entered the war in 1915 and occupied the larger part of the Austro-Hungarian forces, diverting them from attacks upon France, Russia, and Serbia. When Russia collapsed, great numbers of Austro-Hungarian troops, released from the eastern front, reinforced the armies attacking Italy. Though Italy is comparatively young as a modern state, she is old as a nation, for there has never been any question that for centuries the Italian people have had a common language, tradition, and culture.

Yugoslavia is composed—or will be when organized—of three related peoples, all Slavs, but differing in history, religion, and traditions. Of these peoples, the Serbians were in the war from the first, resisting the encroachments of Austria-Hungary. The other two peoples, Croats and Slovenes, were subject peoples under the Austro-Hungarian monarchy of the Hapsburgs. The people who are directly affected by this controversy are principally the Croats. They live chiefly in Croatia, which was a subordinate province of Hungary. These three southern Slav peoples (including those of Serbia, Montenegro, Bosnia, Herzegovina, Slovenia, and Croatia) have agreed to form a confederation. The Yugoslavs, therefore, are not yet a nation, but two of their constituent peoples form nations famed for their love of liberty, and some of the others have been in revolt against the tyranny by which they were oppressed. The Croats form one of these subject peoples, but they have had a considerable measure of autonomy as a part of Hungary.

Thus, on one side of the controversy is a young state, but an ancient nation; on the other side is a nascent confederacy which, though composed in part of old nations, has, as a whole, never been a nation, but is about to become a new state.

FIUME

One of the two bones of contention between Italy and Yugoslavia is the city of Fiume. Situated near the northern end of the Adriatic, next to Istria (which is to be Italian without dispute), but surrounded by territory which is Croatian and serving as the principal port of Croatia, Fiume is in an anomalous position. Its history records the struggles of peoples in this ancient part of the civilized world. Apparently Roman in origin, during the Middle Ages it was held by various rulers. In the fifteenth century it came under the Hapsburg dynasty, but, as during all the preceding years, it retained its largely Italian character. In 1779 it was united to Hungary, with which it has remained with the exception of two brief periods in the nineteenth century. Once, for nine years, it was attached to Austria; and again, later, for nineteen years, it was ruled by the Croats. It has always, however, been very independent in spirit; it has had its own statutes; it has had rights which the Hapsburgs acknowledged by receiving its homage separately; it has used officially the Italian language. When the Croats ruled it, they provided that the city of Fiume should have two seats in the Croatian Legislature; but the city's representatives refused to elect Deputies and left these seats perpetually unoccupied. Fiume much preferred her status in Hungary. When the war drew to an end in October of last year, the Deputy of Fiume in the Hungarian Parliament protested against Fiume's going back to Croatia. The majority of the people of Fiume are undoubtedly Italian in sympathy, and it was at the request of Fiumians that Italian soldiers entered Fiume after the armistice; but the country round about Fiume, as well as the country which it serves as a commercial outlet, is non-Italian. Fiume is the chief port south of Trieste, and its commerce landward is with Croatia, Hungary, Rumania, Czechoslovakia, Austria, and Germany. The only standard-gauge railway connecting an Adriatic port with these countries is that which has its terminus at Fiume.

DALMATIA

What is known as Dalmatia consists of the coast and the coastal islands on the eastern shore of the Adriatic. It has a mixed population. Most of it is Slavic; but the population of many of the towns is largely, if not predominantly, Italian. The coast forms the greatest possible contrast with the western, the Italian, shore of the Adriatic. It is rocky, pierced by inlets and harbors, and marked by a line of islands stretching for a great part of its length. During the war the possession of this coast by Austria-Hungary placed Italy under an enormous handicap. The Austrian fleet could maneuver and form behind the screen of islands and steam out at unexpected points to make an attack wherever the Italian fleet (which had no harbor between the extreme north and the extreme south) was most unprepared. Making these naval attacks in the early morning, the Austrians had the advantage of the sun at their backs. The Austrian submarines, under cover of darkness, could cross to the Italian shore and lie easily on the sandy bottom, concealed by the muddy waters brought down by the Italian rivers. Safe from observation by airplanes, these submarines could rise at any opportune moment, sink Italian shipping, and bombard the Italian coast. The currents of the Adriatic flow north along the Dalmatian coast, sweep to the westward, and then run south along the Italian coast to the Mediterranean. The Austrians could release mines wherever they chose, and the currents would carry them along the Italian coast; while mines released by the Italians would be simply carried out to sea. The possession of Dalmatia by a hostile country has therefore proved itself to be a terrible menace to Italy, for which she has paid a great price in men and treasure.

THE TWO PACTS

Concerning Fiume and Dalmatia there have been two international agreements. One of these is known as the Pact of London, the other as the Pact of Rome. The Pact of London is a treaty secretly contracted between Italy on one side and France and Great Britain on the other. According to this France and Great Britain agreed that if Italy entered the war a victorious peace would insure to her Gorizia and Istria, without Fiume, and a certain portion of the Dalmatian coast and a good many of the islands. (The shaded territory bounded by the heavy black line in the accompanying map indicates the lands which this treaty promised Italy.) The Pact of Rome is not, strictly speaking, an international treaty, but an informal agreement between Italy and the Yugoslavs. By this agreement both sides were supposed to have come to an understanding.

JUGOSLAV ARGUMENTS

In behalf of Yugoslavia the following arguments have been urged:

President Wilson's Fourteen Points have been accepted as the basis on which peace should be made. The President, who issued them, is the most authoritative interpreter of them, and he says that they mean that Italy cannot have Fiume or Dalmatia. Avowing these principles, America entered the war and was welcomed; on the basis of these principles President Wilson initiated peace and hostilities ended. By them, therefore, all the nations in the war are morally bound. Italy should recognize this and yield.

One of these Fourteen Points is the

THE BONES OF CONTENTION

The lands on the Adriatic bordering the Jugoslavie countries are shown above. The heavy black line indicates the frontier according to the London Pact (as explained in the accompanying article); and the shaded portions indicate the territories assigned to Italy disavowal of secret treaties. The London Pact was a secret treaty, and therefore is no longer valid. Moreover, it was not signed by many of the nations that took part in the war; indeed, it was not even known to them, and consequently any peace made by the agreement of all those who took part was quite independent of any such separate arrangement. Besides that change in belligerents there has been another change, namely, the breaking up of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. The Pact of London was made on the understanding that the territory in question belonged to a hostile country; but since the breaking up of the Austro-Hungarian Empire these people in Dalmatia have joined the Allies and are to be in the League of Nations, and their territory must therefore not be treated as hostile territory.

As it is, Italy has got a great deal of territory out of the war, and she ought not to be seeking more. She ought to be content with what she has, and should be warned not to demand too much. If this peace settlement is to make peace secure, it must not leave heartburnings among the Jugoslavs such as the granting of Italy's demand would be sure to leave. Unfortunately, Italy has become imperialistic, and is seeking to do what she has never sought to do before—for the sake of adding territory to bring alien people unwillingly under her sovereignty. The best interests of Italy as well as of Yugoslavia require that Italy's demand for Fiume and the Dalmatian coast be rejected. To this there are even Italians who will agree, for some Italians have expressed the hope that Italy would not do violence to her past by trampling on the rights of others.

As to Fiume, President Wilson's Fourteen Points apply because Fiume is the outlet for non-Italian nations. President Wilson has himself stated this in the following words: "Fiume must serve as the outlet of commerce, not of Italy, but of the land to the north and the northeast of that port, Hungary, Bohemia, Rumania, and the states of the new Yugoslav group. To assign Fiume to Italy would be to create the feeling that we have deliberately put the port upon which all those countries chiefly depend for access to the Mediterranean in the hands of a Power of which it did not form an integral part and whose sovereignty, if set up there, must inevitably seem foreign, not domestic or identified with the commercial and industrial life of the regions which the port must serve." Therefore, following Mr. Wilson's statement, it must be concluded that to concede Fiume to Italy would be to strangle, not only the Slav hinterland, but the countries lying behind it. And Italy recognized this herself, for she agreed in the Pact of London (which she now invokes) to let Fiume be Croatian. She cannot now demand adherence to the treaty and yet also demand Fiume. If England and France are bound by this treaty, they are bound not to give her Fiume. If Fiume is vital to Italy, why did she leave Fiume out of the treaty? Some Italians claim that this ought to be added to her now in payment for the extra cost she incurred on account of the Russian defection. That argument is grotesque, for it makes the Croats pay for what the Russians failed to do. It may be that Fiume is a little more Italian in population than not, but the region of which Fiume is the economic capital is overwhelmingly Croatian. So the principle of self-determination applies as well as the principle of commercial rights.

As to Dalmatia, the only plausible reason for giving it to Italy no longer holds. The Italians want it for reasons of self-defense; but Italy no longer needs to provide for self-defense, because Austria-Hungary, which threatened her, no longer exists; and, moreover, whatever defense she may need she can get through the League of Nations. In view of that fact, Dalmatia ought to go to Yugoslavia because its population is overwhelmingly Yugoslav. There are Italians in Dalmatia, it is true; but they are in the minority, and their interests or desires must be subordinated to those of the Yugoslav majority. In the downfall of Austria-Hungary, which has relieved Italy of her burden of fear and of her need for self-defense, the Jugoslavs, by their disaffection and revolt, were the chief cause. Out of gratitude to them Italians ought willingly to concede this territory. Moreover, even if the Italians are not willing to concede it, the Jugoslavs ought not to be deprived of it. Even if it be conceded that the Italian minority has put its stamp upon the civilization of Dalmatia, that is not conclusive; for if Italy tried to get all the territory which she once ruled in the immemorial past or over which her civilization has spread its influence, she would get the bigger part of Europe. Italy must be content with what she can reasonably claim by virtue of her real needs and the real rights of living populations.

ITALIAN ARGUMENTS

In behalf of Italy the following arguments have been urged:

To listen to the discussions about Fiume and Dalmatia one might imagine that the Allies had forgotten that for over three years Italy fought for their cause and Croats fought against it. There may have been pro-Ally Croats, but there were no Italians fighting against the Allies. Something is due to friends and partners, and, not the least, a measure of confidence.

Italy has no intention of applying to the Fourteen Points in her own case any other interpretation than that which has been applied in other cases. Those Fourteen Points were not put forward as President Wilson's personal views, but as a summary of the common view of all the Allies; and the Allies together and not any one man should interpret them and apply them.

One of the things for which the Allies fought was for the sacredness of treaties. To denounce the London Pact because it was secret is absurd. During war time no belligerent would make public such a treaty for the benefit of the enemy.

Nevertheless Italy's general purposes were known; one of those purposes was to secure her own defense, and the other was to redeem Italia Irredenta. The break-up of the Austro-Hungarian Empire does not alter the face of nature. Italy's reasonable demands for a safe frontier on the north have been recognized, even though there is to be a League of Nations. Why not also on the east? Italy is not seeking territory out of land greed, but out of a legitimate desire to render war against her difficult and to remove causes of irritation among Italians. Italy does not crave rule over alien peoples, but she believes that if in rescuing Italians from alien rules she must incur responsibility for the rule of aliens, her own record in giving liberty to French-speaking, German-speaking, and Slavic-speaking peoples in her borders is evidence that she can be trusted to give liberty to newcomers.

It is to be regretted that the new Yugoslav state is showing at its birth an imperialistic ambition, for Yugoslavia is seeking territory won by Italy and now held by Italy and inhabited by Italians who protest against being transferred to an untried nation. The Croats have never shown any evidence of being able to give liberty to aliens under their control. There should be no talk of Italy's imperialism in the face of the following figures: According to the respective claims of the nations, aliens under Polish control would constitute forty per cent of the population, under Czechoslovak control thirty per cent, under Rumanian control seventeen per cent, under French control over four per cent, while under Italian control less than four per cent.

As to Fiume, first and foremost, the principle of self-determination, if it applies anywhere, applies here. Fiume has declared its independence of Croatia and Hungary and its union to Italy. This the city did by a National Council called together by a meeting of citizens. If Fiume were an isolated city the question might be difficult; but it is not isolated. On the contrary, it is on the Italian side of the river which is the natural border of Italy. That the farming population on the outskirts of Fiume are Croatian is no reason why the city itself should not be allowed to have its natural allegiance to Italy recognized and confirmed. Indeed, Fiume is now Italian. To give it to Croatia would be to wrest it from those who hold it now in fact and by virtue of the people's wish. Commercial justice, as well as self-determination, is on the side of Italian rights in Fiume. The very fact that it is the natural outlet of countries to the north and northeast should determine the decision in favor of Italy. Czechoslovakia, Rumania, and Hungary are as much interested in the port of Fiume as the Croats, and there is reason to believe that the Czechs, the Hungarians, and the Rumanians would rather have Fiume in Italian than in Croatian hands. Moreover, it is important that this outlet to the Adriatic should not be in the hands of any people who can be controlled by Germany. It is obvious that a small and comparatively weak people, numbering only eight million, cannot easily stand up against the commercial aggressions of Austria-Germany, numbering some eighty million. All the weak nations will be better served if Fiume is in the hands of a strong nation like Italy. Before the war Croatia provided only a small proportion of the commerce of Fiume—about seven per cent. The interest of other countries far outweighs the interest of Croatia in this port. It is not as if the Yugoslavs had no other port on the Adriatic. Italy has no intention of cutting off Yugoslavia from the sea. Serbia can have her economic outlet at several points on the coast, and Croatia can have hers on the Channel of Morlacca, including harbors capable of great development and centrally situated. The argument that England and France are bound not to give Fiume to Italy is absurd. That treaty was not a promise to Croatia, but to Italy, and England and France are bound only by what they agreed to do in support of it, not by what they did not agree to do. If justice to the Italians of Fiume and justice to the commercial interests of Europe require that Fiume be made Italian, there is no promise that stands in the way.

As to Dalmatia, the important thing to remember is that strategically it is a menace to Italy, and to Italy alone. From Dalmatia the mainland is safe from attack because of the impregnable barrier of mountains, while Italy is open to attack, as has been proved in this war. The possession of Dalmatia would be therefore for Italy no offensive advantage, but solely of defensive value; but as a defense it is vital. Italy does not ask for the whole of Dalmatia or even a large part of it. The greater part of the coast and of the islands would in any case remain Yugoslav. All that Italy asks is the possession of the Italian parts of Dalmatia, together with such portions as will make it impossible for any Power hereafter to use Dalmatia as a base of attack upon Italy. It is impossible to foresee all future contingencies. No guarantee written on paper can take the place of natural defenses. What Italy wants Dalmatia for is for defense, not against the Slavs, with whom she hopes to be on friendly terms, but against a revival of Germanism. Against that the Yugoslavs themselves are not strong because they are not united, because they are comparatively few in numbers, and because some of them have been and are still in sympathy pro-German. If Dalmatia were purely Slav in population and tradition, there might be more reason for objecting to Italy's claims there; but, in fact, the character of civilization in Dalmatia is derived from Italy. Dalmatia is not merely a relic of the Italian past, but a testimony to the Italian present. The national consciousness of Dalmatia is Italian. The Slavs there are divided in religion, in tradition, and even in the alphabets they use. Furthermore, many of the people of Dalmatia who are commonly counted Slavs are really of Latin origin. These are the so-called Morlacchi who, according to Czechoslovak authority, are "the Romanic shepherds of the mountains of Dalmatia." The cities of Dalmatia, which give the character to the region, are Italian, and it is only recently that the Yugoslavs, and principally the Croats, have thought of Dalmatia as essentially Slavic. Slavic expansion is normally southeast, for between Dalmatia and the rest of the Balkan Peninsula is the great range of the Dinaric Alps. But Italy does not want and has never claimed the whole of Dalmatia. What she wants and feels she has a right to is only one-sixth of what she concedes to the Yugoslavs. Whatever decision is made, there will be either Yugoslavs under Italian rule or Italians under Yugoslav rule. Italy, as a united nation with a great and distinctive civilization, with a history proving her devotion to the cause of liberty, and with a record proving her ability to preserve the rights of peoples of alien origin within her borders, is claiming only that which is in full accord with the spirit of the cause for which she has fought with her allies. Italy has indorsed the plan for a League of Nations. The League of Nations will be the stronger if composed of nations freed from the temptation of attacking others but well defended themselves. She wishes to enter that League strong and unmenaced, with the consciousness that it has been established by a victory which has consummated the struggle for the liberation of her peoples that was begun years ago. Her part in the war she believes her allies ought to accept as pledge of her good faith.

IS A COMPROMISE POSSIBLE?

Much misunderstanding concerning this controversy is due to the fact that the terms used are not altogether clear. When it is said that Fiume should or should not be Italian, it is not clear whether that is meant to apply to commercial control or to political control or to both. When the term Dalmatia is used, the implication is that all of Dalmatia is referred to; but it is plain that Italy's claim to Dalmatia is a claim to only part of the coast and some of the islands. With respect to neither Fiume nor Dalmatia is it a question of all or nothing. It is conceivable, for example, that Fiume could be made a part of Italy politically, preserving its ancient local autonomy, and yet be made subject to commercial regulations of an international or quasi-international character. It does not seem to be out of the range of possibility that sufficient naval and military sites be given to Italy on the Dalmatian Islands to insure Italy against any future attack upon that quarter, and, what is equally important, to establish her peace of mind, and also to give her such towns as are plainly Italian in character, leaving the rest of the coast and islands, with ample access to the Adriatic, to Yugoslavia.

I—DISINTEGRATING GERMANY

BY GREGORY MASON

STAFF CORRESPONDENT OF THE OUTLOOK

THE Germans and the Austrians are badly beaten, and they know it. In analyzing the impressions gathered in a just completed tour of several weeks through Austria and Germany that conviction stands out to me as more important than any other.

I had read of how the returning German troops were welcomed by the populations of German cities after the armistice with flowers and music like conquering heroes, and of how Germans were boasting that their army had not been beaten. These reports were enough to make one wonder if the Teutons had been decisively defeated, after all. I come back now from a circular tour in which I visited Vienna, Prague, Dresden, Berlin, Nuremberg, Munich, and a number of smaller towns, with the conviction that Germany is well licked, and feels it.

How about the German boasting, then, and the welcoming receptions for homecoming soldiers, the music and the wreaths? Well, the receptions for the soldiers were natural enough. Even the bitterest foe of Germany will hardly deny that the German army fought hard and fought well. Remember that to probably the majority of Germans the theory that Germany had been unjustly attacked by Russia and France prevailed up to the last day of fighting. And even if you have lost all your colonies and surrendered your fleet it is human to turn out to greet the home-coming brothers, sons, and husbands who have kept your Fatherland free from invasion for four and a half years. The flowers and the music were simply human nature.

As to the boasting, it is just a pitiful attempt to save a little face. The boy who is thrashed by another mutters, as he picks himself up and pulls the grass out of his hair:

"Aw, yer hit me before I was ready. An' if I weighed as much as you there wouldn't be anythin' to it."

There is one answer which infallibly stops the German's boast that his army was not defeated.

"You know, our army was never really beaten," a German officer said to me in Berlin.

"How do you make that out? You lost the war, didn't you?"

"Yes, we lost the war," answered the officer, "but we were not beaten. We just stopped fighting."

"I see. When it began to go against you, you just quit. Well, if two boys are fighting, for example, or if two men are fighting in the prize ring, and one of them throws up the sponge and quits cold, to our way of thinking, that fellow is a pretty poor sort of a sport. We think a good deal more of a chap who stands up and takes his licking."

The Hun had no rejoinder. None of them has. They have never thought of it that way; but when you put it to them that way, as I did to dozens, they are absolutely floored. There is no chance of saving face before that argument.

Indeed, to my mind, the world has gained a moral advantage over Germany by this war ten times greater than the tremendous physical advantage represented by the enforcement of a humiliating peace. For Germany had the whole world bluffed. By throwing up the sponge before her own soil was even touched, above all by surrendering ignobly the great fleet which had been her proudest boast, Germany punctured her own bluff. She did more than that; she showed us that her heart is yellow. Even should she be allowed to build a fleet and an army greater than the fleet and army just dismantled, the world need never fear her again as it feared her before. Can you imagine the laugh that would be heard from Cape Horn to the North Cape if a new German navy should begin to brag about another "Tug"? If their ships had gone out to fight a glorious losing fight, as the Spanish fought off Cuba, if their Kaiser had gone down at the head of his men in all his shining armor, there at least would have been a dramatic gesture, a brave tradition to build on. But the world knows now that the Germans are a nation of quitters who lose no more gracefully at war than they lose at golf or tennis.

Germany is beaten, and Germany knows it. The rumors of a great army being secretly prepared for a new attack on France are the purest poppycock. I doubt if the Germans could get together four army corps to-day. There are many men in uniform in Germany, but they are not an army. Most of them are wearing uniform because they have no other clothes. With the exception of the small force which still supports the Government, all semblance of discipline is gone. Officers are stripped of the insignia of rank, and where it is necessary to get permission from military authorities to travel through Germany, in most cases the permission is given by private soldiers or their elected chiefs. As the Russian army rotted away, so is the German army rotting.

The arrogant tone which has crept into the public speeches of some of Germany's political leaders lately is not an indication that they do not know they are beaten. On the other hand, this arrogance is the arrogance of sheer desperation. As they have seen Bolshevism advancing on the one hand, and have seen on the other hand attempts to enforce a peace based on bitterness, the Germans have tried to console themselves with the reflection that things could not possibly be worse, and, knowing they had nothing more to lose, have permitted themselves to talk with the boldness of a man whose neck already feels the noose.

After asking whether the Germans are soundly beaten, the question people most frequently ask a man or woman who has been in Germany is whether it is true that the Germans are really suffering for want of food. Probably the persistence of some doubt on this point in the minds of some Americans is due to the reports of army officers from occupied Germany, where the food situation has greatly improved since the occupation, or of officers who have been to Berlin or other large cities in Germany proper, but who have confined their observations to the luxurious hotels at which they invariably put up. The truth is that food in Germany is lacking both in quantity and variety, and that such food as there is is generally of poor quality and—even at good hotels—poorly cooked. I had indigestion all the time I was in Germany. It may not be true that many people are dying of downright starvation, although some undoubtedly are so dying; but thousands are dying of diseases which would never be fatal if the people had enough to eat—diseases like influenza, pneumonia, and tuberculosis. I have no statistics to prove how disease has increased in German cities, but I got the following statistics for the city of Prague, the capital of the Czechoslovaks, where conditions are noticeably better than in either Vienna or Berlin. In 1914 births exceeded deaths in Prague by .60. In 1917 deaths exceeded births by 9.14. And these deaths, be it remembered, were all among civilians; war fatalities are not included. In 1914 in Prague orphan asylums there were 2,018 patients, of whom 286 died. In 1917 there were 1,818 inmates, of whom 1,115 died; and in 1918 there were 833 patients, of whom 704 died. Conditions in the orphan asylums in Vienna and Berlin are even worse. In fact, the capital of the Germans and the capital of the Austrians are suffering more for lack of food than any other cities I have seen anywhere. And, as far as I can judge, the food shortage is about equally serious in Berlin and Vienna.

But in all other respects Vienna is far less unpleasant to live in now than Berlin. The Viennese bear their hardships with a sort of fatalistic melancholy, while the small minority of Berliners who have any money left are bent on ending their lives quickly in debauchery, and the great majority who have no money are going about robbing the minority who have, or are expressing their rage against society and fate in aimless anarchy. In Vienna there have been only a few shots fired in all the hard weeks since the armistice was signed, while in Berlin hardly a day passes without a battle, or at least a lively skirmish. Crime of all sorts walks abroad blatantly in the dark, dirty streets of Berlin. The whole capital is a camp of armed men who appear to be uncertain from what quarter their foe will strike, or even who their next foe will be. The workingmen are all armed, and most of the bourgeoisie have laid hold of some form of weapon against emergencies. Government troops march through the streets as they did during the war, and soldiers, in their "tin hats" or in the picturesque leather spike helmets that are so much appreciated by American girls as souvenirs when brought back by dough-boys from the Rhine, guard all public buildings and all the big hotels.

I lived at the Hotel Adlon, where there were fifteen or twenty American officers in Berlin on Government missions. Every night the great iron gate before the front entrance was reinforced with a heavy chain and two machine guns were posted a few feet behind it where they could rake the street from the cover of two small potted trees. The other entrances were also protected by machine guns, as was the roof, and soldiers armed to the teeth prowled about the corridors of the great hostelry all night long to guard against treachery or surprise. The loyalty of none of these Government troops can be counted on, however. While I was in Berlin, fortunately, the Spartacists not once attacked in the vicinity of this hotel, although there were several battles between them and Government troops in the suburbs, and once three American correspondents, one of them a woman, were fired on in their taxicab by a mob which took them to be Government people.

"What are the German people thinking about?" I asked an American newspaper man who had been in Berlin several weeks.

"I can best answer that," responded the newspaper man, "by telling you what a Russian peasant told me when I asked him a few months ago what the Russian masses were thinking about. 'What is a cow thinking about?' he replied, scornfully. 'Grass!'"

Wherever an American goes in Germany he is stopped by people who ask the same old question, "When are you going to send us food?" Your elevator boy asks you that, your barber asks you, and your waiter, when he places before you the monotonous fare of Schweinefleisch, potatoes, and carrots, puts the same query.

With Lieutenant E. O. Wiederanders, an American officer in the courier service, I flew from Berlin to Munich in a German bombing plane after the Handley-Page model, driven by a German ace who had not made his kills unhindered, as his scarred face and body testified. We made three stops between Berlin and Munich—once to fill up our gasoline tank, and twice to escape the cold, driving rain, which even through the leather helmets we wore stung our foreheads like bird-shot. Although each time we landed in fields far from any big town, almost before we could get our helmets and goggles off the big plane was surrounded by a crowd of rustics, who seemed to spring from nowhere.

"When is America going to send us food?" they asked as soon as they recognized our nationality.

But so many postponements have there been in the delivery of this food, and so little of it is there arriving even now, that it is not uncommon to find a note of sarcasm in a German's voice when he speaks on this subject.

And, indeed, to an American in Germany or to one just returned from that country there seems to be an astonishing amount of misconception prevalent among the Allies as to what is Germany's real position. The truth is that the war is over and Germany thoroughly beaten. With thousands of Germans dying from lack of nourishment, can any name but plain inhumanity be given to the continuance of a blockade which prevents the Germans from catching fish in the North Sea for their hungry population? To listen to some of the talk that comes from the Peace Conference, particularly from French representatives, one would think that Germany was still a powerful, well-organized military nation merely resting on her arms and likely to launch a new attack at any minute. Undoubtedly there are some reactionary influences at work in Germany, undoubtedly it is necessary to be on guard against them. Undoubtedly, too, the suffering of Germany this winter is a wholesome moral lesson for her. But to keep German fishing boats from taking fish from the North Sea seems like carrying technicalities too far.

Either there will be a reasonably strong Germany or there will be a Bolshevik Germany. Take your choice. A reasonably strong democratic Germany may be a menace to France (although I do not believe that). But a Bolshevik Germany will be a very powerful menace to all the nations in the world as they are at present constituted.

It is difficult to base many prophecies for the future on the present situation in Germany. Conditions vary greatly in different parts of the country, and conditions vary greatly from day to day in the same parts of the country. I believe that it is by no means certain that Germany will not return to monarchy, although it is very unlikely that a Hohenzollern will ever reign again. I believe the present Ebert-Scheidemann Government is very weak, and is growing weaker every day. I believe, on the whole, Spartacism or Bolshevism is growing stronger. But this movement is limited to the industrial districts—a fact for which its opponents may be profoundly thankful, in Germany as in Russia. It is bitterly combated by the German Church and by the German farmers. And if, for instance, the city of Munich should set up an out-and-out Bolshevik Government, it could soon be starved into surrender by the surrounding agricultural regions of Bavaria. The Munich Bolsheviks are well aware of this, and are therefore inclined to temporize. The fact remains that there is in Germany a growing mass of discontented citizens inclined to side with any active faction which promises them improved living conditions. Ebert is in the tragic position which Kerensky occupied before his downfall. The Russians demanded of Kerensky peace and food. Because he gave them neither his government was destroyed. The Germans are demanding of Ebert and Scheidemann peace and food. Ebert and Scheidemann seem unable to give the people either, but unless they soon succeed in getting these things for the people their Government will collapse. About the only generalizations on the internal situation in Germany which I feel reasonably safe in making are these three:

First, conditions in Germany will be worse before they are better.

Second, affairs have already reached a state where it is evident that Germany cannot be saved without foreign intervention. This intervention may take the form of economic assistance and revictualment, or military occupation, or all of these measures. There are not a few Germans who would welcome the military occupation of their whole country by American and British troops. Occupation by the French and Belgians would be very unpopular. It does not seem likely that there will be any government in Germany capable by its own strength of enforcing the provisions of the peace, or even of guaranteeing the proper distribution of such food supplies as might be sent to Germany.

Third, the peace terms to be enforced on Germany (and which will very likely be announced before this is published) ought to be just, which means that they ought not to be as harsh as a good many would like to have them. To try to impose extreme conditions on Germany is not to the interest of the Allies—leaving aside the question of humanity and justice—because to try to impose extreme conditions on Germany will simply have the effect of throwing that country over irrevocably to the Bolsheviks. Germany ought to be made to pay some indemnity, of course, but to try to get too much will simply result in getting nothing, and will lead to an extension of the epidemic of communism throughout Europe.

II—GERMANY: SLACKER AMONG NATIONS

BY ALEXANDER GREEN

The facts presented in the following article have been collected from a wide variety of sources, which have enabled Dr. Green (who is a graduate of Columbia University, is conversant with many languages, and has for several years been a close student of economic and political conditions in Central Europe) to see the situation in Germany in perspective.—THE EDITORS.

FEEDING AN ADVERSARY

Our adversaries the Germans continue to be, for they object to the indemnities and territorial cessions that are to be required of them. Yet they demand unconditional supplies of food to be sent to them immediately. These failing, the spokesmen intimate, the nation will make trouble by joining the Bolsheviks of eastern Europe.

At home, as it turns out, the people who make this sort of threat have quite other views on the way to deal with recalcitrants. According to a despatch, the Minister of Foreign Supplies for the State of Prussia announced the other day that the state would cut off food from districts where general strikes were in progress.

According to what the Germans tell us, to refuse them food instead of making them see reason will drive the nation into Bolshevism. According to what the Socialist leaders in Prussia practice, to refuse food to cantankerous districts of Germany will not spread Bolshevism in those districts, but will on the contrary make the disturbers see reason very promptly.

In which case do the Germans merit belief?

—From the New York "Evening Sun,"
April 1, 1919.

THE plenipotentiaries of the German Government at Trèves and at Spa have been making the most of the bugaboo of Bolshevism that is soon to take complete mastery over Germany unless speedy aid is extended in the form both of foodstuffs for the masses and of raw materials for industrial purposes. They point out with increasing insistence that Germany is suffering from an industrial crisis, that the number of idlers has been growing with alarming rapidity, that there are strike meetings in all parts of the land, and that all this disturbance is the direct result of the Allies' blockade on raw materials and their unyielding ban on German exportation.

It is undoubtedly true that foodstuffs are scarce in Germany. It is equally true, however, that much of this dearth is the direct result of profiteering speculation. With the exception of fatty substances and the products of foreign lands, there is at hand in Germany quite a considerable supply of native produce of all kinds. The crux of the situation is that this material is undistributed; it is hoarded both by the peasants whose shrewd minds view with suspicion the actual currency value of the hyperinflated market prices, and by the get-rich-quick financiers who acknowledge fealty to no other power but the well-lined strong box. Let us not forget that for four years the German soil has sufficed to feed much larger populations and more exacting armies of men than it is obliged to do to-day.

But when we come to the question of raw material for the German industries, we meet with an entirely different situation. That is to say, it will be found that the absence of such material is by no means the only, or even the leading, cause of industrial idleness and its concomitant industrial disturbances. It will be found, on the contrary, from the evidence furnished by the German newspapers themselves, that the economic crisis is due rather to a psychological crisis now taking place within the German nation, to the workings not only of the torpor caused by the sudden defeat of their once powerful armies, but, more correctly, of the general feeling of lassitude and idleness that seems to be pervading every part of the land and weighing down like a terrible nightmare upon all effort at reconstruction. At the same time that the newspapers accuse the enemies of Germany of cherishing cruel designs upon her future and bewail the blockade still in existence as to raw materials, they publish repeated appeals to their own nationals to return to work and give their industries a fresh start! This fact alone probes right under the superficial wail and uncovers the real cause of the social and economic unrest.

It is true that the number of idlers is rapidly increasing. In Berlin, according to latest reports, there were 95,216 unemployed on January 9, 130,570 on January 19, and 153,984 on January 29. In Bremen conditions are similar. For the identical dates this town registered 5,233, 7,042, and 9,392, respectively. And so on in Frankfurt and other industrial centers. Quite recently an official German note estimated the number of unemployed throughout the Empire at one million, with Berlin itself having a quota of 250,000. But, in striking contrast to this situation, work is plentiful. That is, plentiful work is offered in all the papers. According to the "Berliner Tageblatt" (December 22, 1918), however, the large masses of demobilized soldiers prefer to roam about the land and be fêted as heroes. And so it is not strange to find the "Tag" (December 23, 1918) complain that six thousand soldiers in Munich go from barracks to barracks in search of food, when on the day the electric works opened in Walchensee, which are designed to furnish power to all of Bavaria, only two workmen presented themselves.

Instances of this unemployment directly due to idleness can be multiplied ad infinitum, and that out of the mouths of the Germans themselves. Here follow some additional reports: The "Münchener Neueste Nachrichten" of January 4 states: "In Munich about eleven thousand workless persons receive succor, when 3,724 places are being offered in the countryside, when the near-by factory at Trostberg seeks 1,000 operatives, and when practically all the coal mines complain that they cannot get miners in sufficient numbers." The "Frankfurter Zeitung" of the same date states that 50,000 persons are drawing upon the Berlin authorities for their sustenance, when 100,000 workers are sought for the lignite industry at places but a few hours distant from Berlin. But, to get even nearer to the facts, right in the city of Berlin, according to the "Welt am Montag" of January 16, the street car companies have not been able to find more than 350 out of the 1,000 workers sorely needed by them. Similarly, the sugar industries in Brandenburg are at a standstill and the beet already at the doors of the factories is allowed to rot for lack of workers.

Of extreme interest is the January 18 report of "Vorwärts" on the unemployment situation: "In Silesia and in Saxony the mines are in need of operatives. Bavaria announces a dearth in agricultural help. In Mecklenburg, since the departure of the prisoners of war and of foreign workers, the lack of workmen is not being supplied by our returning soldiers." Foresters, woodcutters, stable hands, construction workers, kitchen servants, and a hundred other types of skilled and unskilled laborers are urgently wanted, but not obtained.

The situation is indeed so precarious that the newspapers themselves are discussing the ways and means of applying proper remedies. They point out that the high rate of financial aid given to the unemployed makes unemployment a convenient and lucrative condition to cultivate. They also insist that no entrepreneur can consistently be asked to undertake or even continue production if the present rate of salaries is to prevail. But what they can find no remedy for, while they all admit its existence, is a deep-seated aversion to work among the working classes.

In stating that unemployment has become a veritable profession that supports its man better than if he worked, the "Simplicissimus" of January 7 brings a cartoon representing two workmen in front of an official bulletin offering employment in the mines near the resort of Walchensee. "Well, I don't know," says one of the men; "it's a good place for winter sports. I might yet have my unemployment allotment sent there for the coming months." And no wonder that idleness is so highly prized. In Munich the minimum for men per day is four marks, and for the women three. In addition the unemployed receive free theater and movie tickets as well as entrée to the concerts. And, with all this, the "Münchner Post" is in a position to be able to report that on January 7 a mass-meeting passed a resolution demanding an increase in the "indemnities" to ten marks per day, and with retroactive features.

It is thus possible, under present circumstances, for the allotment to exceed the salary received from steady occupations, so that even if the workman has accepted a position he is ready to desert it at a moment's notice, especially if his renewed demands are not properly heeded. That this situation is, in turn, the mother of multitudinous strikes, without much rhyme or reason, has been recognized by the Independent Socialists themselves. Witness the manifesto signed on January 2 by their leaders, Strobel, Hoffmann, and Rosenfeld: "Claims for increase in wages have of late become so frequent as to give rise to grave fears for the ruin of our productions. This can have for a result only unemployment, hunger, and misery. The exploitations of the state are conditioned by the same rules as those of private industries. Neither the railways nor the mines nor the other industries of the state can support much longer a condition of affairs under which the expenses are greater than the receipts."

The essential and outstanding fact is that Germany does not work any more. Germany has ceased to be the industrious land of painstaking artisans. The much-vaunted conscientiousness of the German workman is gone—gone at least for the time being. And this fact has been known—and concealed—by the Germans since the end of 1918, when one of the Socialist Ministers in charge of economic reconstruction, August Muller, made his report on the economic situation and the economic problems of the German Empire. Accounts from all papers and from all parts of the land confirm this general relaxation. A reading of the "Schwäbischer Merkur" for January 8, of the "Welt am Montag" for January 16, of "Vorwärts" for January 18, of the "Frankfurter Zeitung" for January 25, and of the "Berliner Tageblatt" for January 30, brings strange narratives of unheard-of conditions.

Soldiers in the country idle away their time in inns and about the villages. They sell their arms and horses in order to keep up their indolent estate. Coal, wood, and quarry stones are in immediate demand for reconstruction. But there is no one or few to lift the snow, to fell the trees, or to break the stones, and the miners seem to have taken to strikes with a will and a vigor. It is asserted on every hand that it is useless to increase the wages when Germany becomes daily less able to produce. "It is an error," states a Berlin journal, "to believe that lack of raw materials is the only cause of the staggering unemployment. We can say without difficulty that a large number of workmen are voluntary idlers. Four years of the war has taken away the taste for work." ("Welt am Montag," January 19, 1919.)

A formal avowal of this fact has even been made by the official organ of the Berlin Government, "Vorwärts," January 18: "In certain branches of our economic life there are orders in quantities. But we are constrained to admit the regrettable circumstance that the production has, on account of voluntary suspensions of work, and due also to sabotage, taken a frightful slump. For instance, in a locomotive factory near Berlin where before the Revolution an engine was turned out every day, there has not been made a single locomotive during the entire month of December. The orders would have made full production possible and the need for raw materials was largely covered."

This same organ of Ebert and of Scheidemann, alarmed at the lawlessness, declares accordingly, on February 2, what no modern Socialist newspaper has ever been found to declare, namely, that if the present situation continues it would be regretted that the capitalistic constraint has been removed! In other words, the acknowledgment is made and documented that the Socialistic feeling of duty and responsibility towards the working classes offers no incentive to work, and that it has actually paid the workers to simulate unemployment.

Nor have the remedies proposed done away with the proved charms of otiose dignity. True, on January 24, 1919, the new governmental order was to take effect according to which the various communities are invited to withdraw assistance from those who refuse to accept work to which they are sent, even if the work is of a different profession and in a strange locality, provided the physical status of the men selected is satisfactory and the salary offered is not inferior to that prevailing in the communities themselves. This first step towards obligatory labor has since been found to be mere a paper measure. Workmen refuse to change their residence, refuse to be separated from their families and the friends, offer organized protest to attempts at being "colonized" at strange places, and prefer to remain in the towns where, on one pretext or other, they can peacefully receive their allotment, instead of handling the spade, the rake, or the plowshare.

To conclude this survey, unemployment in Germany is not the result of lack of foodstuffs or of raw materials in industries so much as of a change, and a radical one at that, in the inner disposition of the German workman. The ancient discipline founded on the notion of "service" and dependence has been abolished. But the free discipline that Socialism is aiming to have each man impose upon his conscience, the notion of social service, in short, has not yet found its way into the proletariat cast of thought. Like Kundry, laborite Germany is mid-mide! The disillusionment of defeat, the sudden discovery that, instead of enormous indemnities from their enemies they themselves were to be placed in bondage in order to expiate their crimes, have worked with all the malice and mischief of the incubus of discouragement. The Germans have, it is easily understandable, labored hard to realize the national dream of world-greatness. Their factories have belched incessant fire, their brows have been bathed in oceans of sweat. And all this to no avail. Is it to be wondered at, then, that but few give a moment's thought to the urgent need of work, that the large masses of workmen refuse to lend an ear to what they now term the "False Gospel of Labor"?

This one lesson, then, stands out supreme amid the clamor and clash of the Peace Conference politicians, a lesson out of the mouths of the Germans themselves, whining with fear or loud with impotent defiance as they now appear to us. What a goodly section of the German people demands that we incontinently send raw material and foodstuffs in unlimited quantities, an equally influential number of them admit that, having started the war with hopes of an economic, if not political, domination of the globe, the German masses are unable to rise above the disillusionment of their defeat. The war has robbed them of their energies. In strange perverseness, they insist upon prolonging the obsequies and deepening the mourning. In short, together with Russia, they are the classic example of a nation of slackers. What Germany needs is not food or raw material so much as a sound pulling together of the individual nerves in order to overcome her ruinous national neurasthenia.

"ATHENIAN ABERDEEN"

BY THE MARQUIS OF ABERDEEN AND TEMAIR

GEORGE GORDON, fourth Earl of Aberdeen, was the Lord Aberdeen to whom Byron referred when, in his satire on "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," he wrote:

"First in the oat-fed phalanx shall be seen
The travel'd thane, Athenian Aberdeen."

Oat-fed and Athenian would seem to be a strange conjunction; but of course Byron was using the former epithet to fit the main drift of his philippic as a whole; and the somewhat jeering expression recalls Dr. Johnson's entry in his dictionary where the word "oats" is thus explained: "A species of grain used in England for feeding horses and in Scotland for feeding men;" and it will be remembered that a repartee to this would be sarcasm was given by the Scot who, on being twitted with Dr. Johnson's definition, replied: "Yes, and where will you find better horses or better men?"

After filling various important offices of state during a long spell of public life which had been commenced at an early age, Lord Aberdeen became Prime Minister at the beginning of the year 1853. I was then about six years old, and my recollections of my grandfather are very distinct; and no wonder, for he was essentially genial and kind to children. It was his regular habit to drive down from his London house every Saturday or Sunday to the Rangers' Lodge in Greenwich Park (of which he was Ranger), the house being occupied by his eldest son, Lord Haddo, and Lady Haddo, to whom he was devotedly attached. During these visits I used frequently to request him to bring me some specially designated toy when next he came to see us, and he would then tie a knot in his pocket-handkerchief as a reminder. On one occasion my request was for "a cow and a camel." Possibly I had seen in some picture-book these animals harnessed together, though one would think that such a combination would be rare even in Bible lands; but sure enough my grandfather on his next arrival produced a toy cow and a camel, though, as he explained, these were not obtainable yoked together. This occurred during the absorbingly anxious and difficult time of his Premiership. It will perhaps be permissible to recall one other small incident of this period because it is illustrative of the subject of my sketch.

The garden of the Rangers' Lodge was large and well kept. The head gardener was named Basket (his real name). He always appeared in a tall hat—no doubt somewhat antique. He also wore a blue pron tucked to one side except when he was engaged in potting plants. I am sure he was a good gardener, but his temper was not always affable, at least so it seemed to us children. And on one occasion he complained to my grandfather that the children were a trouble and interfered with the flower-beds. Lord Aberdeen at once bethought him of a historic utterance by King Louis Philippe, who was once, through some inadvertence, surprised by the sudden entry of one of the foreign Ambassadors while he, the King, was romping with his children or grandchildren on the floor. The embarrassing moment was relieved by the tact of the King, who, drawing himself up, said to the Ambassador:

"Et vous, Excellence, vous avez des enfants?" And so Lord Aberdeen, adopting a somewhat oracular tone, met the point of the complaint by saying:

"Mr. Basket, have you any children?"

To which the worthy gardener replied, "Indeed, yes, my lord; and one of my boys is a clerk in an office, and I shall be very glad if your lordship will use your influence to get him promoted."

I have alluded to these incidents as indicating how different Lord Aberdeen was in private life from the austere and solemn person that he was widely supposed by repute to be—and it must be admitted that his manner and aspect were sometimes such as to give to strangers some ground for that impression. Thus Mr. Gladstone used to tell us that when, in the year 1837, Sir Robert Peel offered to him the position of Under-Secretary for the Colonies—Mr. Gladstone's first important official post—Sir Robert added, "You'd better go at once to see Lord Aberdeen," who was then Secretary of State for the Colonies; and Mr. Gladstone declared that he went with feelings of veritable trepidation and alarm, because, as he said, although he had heard of Lord Aberdeen's high character, he had also always understood that he was a man of cold manners and haughty reserve; but before three minutes of conversation, all Mr. Gladstone's apprehensions "melted away like snow in the sun," and that interview was the commencement of a friendship which lasted during the remainder of Lord Aberdeen's life. Of this friendship Mr. Gladstone also said to me, "I have admired and respected many statesmen, but of your grandfather alone I could say that I loved him."

As Prime Minister Lord Aberdeen had no easy task. His Government was a coalition, which of course usually means that all the ordinary difficulties of a Prime Minister are inevitably increased, especially when such an administration includes several members whose previous careers or attainments cause them to feel that they would be quite as fully qualified as the Premier (or, in their own opinion, even better qualified) to occupy his position. Such, for instance, was apparently the attitude of one of Lord Aberdeen's colleagues, Lord Palmerston. During one of my grandfather's weekly visits to the Rangers' Lodge Lady Haddo said to him: "But, papa, if Lord Palmerston is so anxious to be Secretary for War, why not appoint him?" "Well, you see," replied my grandfather, "this is a coalition Government, and we must keep the balance of parties. Already there are seven Whigs to five Peelites; and the War Office being at such a time as this the most important post next to the Prime Minister's, if I put Palmerston there, the effect would be disturbing; so the Duke of Newcastle must be Secretary for War and Palmerston will have the Home Office." This was just what Lord Palmerston did not desire, and he became a decidedly restless member of the team. A little story is told, which, so far as I know, has never appeared in print, that may possibly indicate that Lord Palmerston did not take a very serious view of the duties of his department; at any rate, it illustrates a certain easy jocularity which became one of his characteristics and certainly promoted his later successes and popularity. A certain notorious criminal named Palmer had been hung for poisoning. The local authorities of the town where he had lived, which I need not mention, considered that it would be desirable that the name of the place should be altered; and accordingly a deputation proceeded to London to place this request before the Home Secretary. Lord Palmerston discouraged the idea, but eventually said: "Well, gentlemen, if you are bent upon changing the designation of your town, why not let it be named after me, as I happen to be at present the Secretary of State for Home Affairs?" After brief reflection the deputation withdrew, and the name of the town has remained unchanged to this day, and surely without detriment.

But if Lord Palmerston was a troublesome member of the Cabinet, Lord John Russell was not less a disturbing force. He frequently threatened to resign, and, although there need be no question as to his sincerity, the course which he eventually adopted (namely, resigning at the moment when there was most need for loyal co-operation—that is to say, in the face of a motion which was practically a vote of censure on the Government) was most embarrassing for his colleagues.

It may be permissible to quote here a portion of a letter written some time previously by Lord Aberdeen to the Duke of Newcastle:

"You must allow me, my dear Duke, very strongly to recommend to you a disposition to put the most charitable construction upon all things. If we are to act at all with Lord John, it is clear that to do so to any good purpose it must be upon a footing of mutual confidence and respect. He may have many failings, which we all have, but if I did not think him essentially honorable and true there could be no cordiality between us, and therefore no common action."

It is tempting to quote further from the correspondence of that period, but doubtless the indulgence of the editors of The Outlook must not be too freely taxed. Fortunately a biography of Lord Aberdeen is now in course of preparation, and its publication may be looked for in the near future.<sup>1</sup>

During the winter of 1853-4 ominous war clouds were accumulating and a war fever was being fomented throughout England. The Prime Minister was by disposition eminently a man of peace. And, even apart from this, he had in early life passed through an experience which indelibly impressed upon him a vivid sense of the horrors of war.

It happened that in the year 1813, before he was thirty years of age, he was intrusted by the British Government with an important embassy, the primary object of which was to induce Austria to join the allies in the great war against Napoleon. This mission (the purpose of which was attained) involved Lord Aberdeen's personal presence at the various headquarters of the allies during an extended period, and during his travels in company with the allied armies he witnessed scenes, especially after the battle of Leipsic, which were of an appalling character. In those days, of course, there were no "high explosives," etc.; on the other hand, the arrangements for the care of the wounded were lamentably defective; and it was such sights as that of many wounded men left lying among the dead on the battlefield sometimes for days together, crying, often in vain, for help, that imparted to Lord Aberdeen "that abhorrence of any but defensive war" which he retained for the remainder of his life.

During all the anxious months while the question of war or peace with Russia was being agitated Lord Aberdeen might truly have said in the words of the Psalmist: "I labor for peace; but when I speak unto them thereof, they make them ready for battle." And in March, 1854, war was declared by England and France against Russia.

By the beginning of 1855 there was some hope of a reasonable peace being secured, but the motion in Parliament (already alluded to) for an inquiry into the conduct of the war, which was tantamount to a vote of censure, having been carried, the Aberdeen Cabinet resigned. It is a curious comment, however, on the whirligig of politics and of time that within a very few months most of the members of that Cabinet found themselves again in office, with Lord Palmerston as Prime Minister; and it is worth remarking that in this dénouement Lord Aberdeen, being out of office, gave his assistance and advice in support of Lord Palmerston.

When I again saw my grandfather, in 1856, at the family home in Scotland, he was much changed. No doubt advancing years had their effect, but I am convinced that it was the war that broke his health and spirits; and I cannot remember seeing him smile again. A pathetic proof of the depth of his feelings on that subject came to light after his death. I must premise that the improvements carried out by him on his Scottish estates had included the building of schools, manses, etc., in addition, of course, to the erection of numerous buildings connected with agriculture and the planting of millions of trees. A new church was contemplated for the parish of Methlick, in which Haddo House is situated; but, to the surprise of many who knew how congenial to him would be the building of a new church, which was certainly needed, Lord Aberdeen indicated that he would leave that work to be done by his eldest son when he succeeded to the title and estate; and after Lord Aberdeen had passed away there was found among his private documents something which explained his attitude; namely, on slips of paper were written by his own hand the words of verses in the Old Testament (1 Chron. xxii. 7, 8): "And David said to Solomon, My son, as for me, it was in my mind to build an house unto the name of the Lord my God: but the word of the Lord came to me, saying, Thou hast shed blood abundantly, and hast made great wars: thou shalt not build an house unto my name, because thou hast shed much blood upon the earth in my sight."

But, although the declining years of his life were thus saddened, there was serenity and the old domestic charm. Being still a small urchin, I used often while my grandfather was breakfasting to present to him a billiard ball, which was supposed to represent a boiled egg, placed in the cup-shaped top of an inkstand. There was an interested motive in this attention, for it was gravely responded to by the bestowal of bun and jam, these being of course unattainable at my much earlier Spartan breakfast in the nursery.

In the autumn of 1857 there was an episode which cheered and gratified Lord Aberdeen. This was a visit from Queen Victoria, who was accompanied by the Prince Consort and most of their family.

Lord Aberdeen's feeling toward the Queen was always that of a peculiarly affectionate and loyal devotion. The warmth of her Majesty's friendship for him was no secret, and it was of no ephemeral sort. I possess a volume ("Life of the Prince Consort"), received as a gracious gift from Queen Victoria, which bears on the fly-leaf, in her Majesty's autograph, these words:

"To John Campbell Gordon," etc.,
"Grandson of the Queen's valued friend, the Fourth Earl of Aberdeen."
"VICTORIA, R."

Lord Aberdeen's death took place in December, 1860.

In the British National Temple of Fame, Westminster Abbey, his monument is a fine marble bust, and below it are inscribed simply his name and one single word in Greek character—Δικαίολόγος—"Most Just." This epitaph was suggested by Dean Stanley, and no doubt there is an appropriateness in this mode of attributing, through the language of the Athenians, this high and noble quality. But no one single expression could delineate the main features of a truly comprehensive character, and I venture to conclude by quoting some brief expressions from a tribute to Lord Aberdeen which was offered by his distinguished friend Mr. Gladstone:

"There were several mental virtues that he possessed in a degree very peculiar; there were, I think, one or two in which he stood almost alone. . . . I will name the following characteristics, one and all of which were more prominent in him than in any public man I ever knew: mental calmness; the absence of all egotism; the love of exact justice; a thorough tolerance of spirit; and last, and most of all, an entire absence of suspicion. There was something very remarkable in the combination of these qualities as well as in their separate possession. . . . This entire immunity from suspicion, which makes our minds in general like a haunted place, and the sense of the immunity which he conveyed to his friends in all his dealings with them, combined with the deep serenity of his mind, which ever seemed to beguile and allay by some kindly process of nature excitement in others, gave an indescribable charm to all intercourse with him in critical and difficult circumstances. . . . All the qualities and parts in which he was great were those that are the very foundation-stones of our being; as foundation-stones they are deep, and as being deep they are withdrawn from view; but time is their witness and their friend, and in the final distribution of posthumous fame Lord Aberdeen has nothing to forfeit, he has only to receive."

CHILDREN AND TOYS

BY NORA ATWOOD

AUTHOR OF "THEORY AND PRACTICE OF THE KINDERGARTEN"

THE number and variety of toys that are provided for the children, or even for the only child, of our comfortably conditioned Americans constitute a source of constant surprise and inquiry to the intelligent observer. It would seem as if the indulgent parents, the fond relatives, and the devoted friends vied with one another in providing toys for the children, and that they were guided chiefly by the thought, "the more the merrier." In some cases there seems to be a kind of rivalry between families, the high aim being to see whose child can boast the largest number of and the most expensive toys.

The heterogeneous character of the toys indicates that they are generally selected with no thought of the educational significance of toys. Some of these parents and guardians of children would undoubtedly laugh at the idea of a toy as an educational means. In their minds a toy is solely for amusement and entertainment.

The idea that children get their entire education within the four walls of a school-room is long since obsolete. We all know, whether we think much on the subject or not, that a large part of one's education is derived outside of the school-room. The little child's education begins in the early months of his life, and as he emerges from the passive to the more active state of his being toys begin to be a very important element in the educational process.

The little child is more or less a passenger in these early years. He must go where the adult directs, he must do as he is told, he must accept the environment provided for him. He has, in short, little choice, in spite often of vehement protest, but to accept what the adult sees fit to furnish him. And yet, even in these early years, he often indicates his need—the thing which his developing being hungers for—if only we adults have the understanding mind. His treatment of his toys is frequently a lesson for us, if we are wise enough to heed it. Witness, for example, in the case of a little child two or three years of age who has this heterogeneous mass of toys provided for him, the things which he discards and destroys, and then note the toys to which he clings, the toys of which he never tires. Is there not a lesson in this for those who have the will to see?

The study of the educational value of toys presents two aspects, the positive and the negative. The toy in itself is a material thing which has for the purchaser a neutral aspect. It is only when taken in relation to the individual child that it becomes something more than a thing of wood and paint or of kid and bisque. For Johnny, aged two, this box of elaborate architectural blocks may present a negative aspect, for it invites to destruction; whereas for Harold or Dorothy, aged six, it becomes a positive agency, opening up delightful fields of new endeavor and rich reward.

TOYS AND TRAITS

It makes, therefore, a great difference in our estimate of toys whether we look at them simply as interesting inventions designed to amuse and entertain children or whether we look at them more critically to ascertain how they will function in the developing life of a child. It makes a still greater difference which point of view we hold when we purchase these toys for our children. We may thus be a direct means of turning the activity of the children upon whom we bestow these purchases into developing and productive channels or into dulling and destructive courses.

Let us for a moment catalogue some of the positive and negative effects of toys, so that we may more clearly understand what we mean when we speak of toys as an educational agency.

Toys lead primarily either to a constructive or a destructive tendency. Toys develop either a selfish or an unselfish instinct in children. Toys kindle the imagination or they dull it. Toys lead either to contentment or discontent. Toys lay the foundation for stability of character or for the vacillating, restless temperament. Toys engender care, thoughtfulness, responsibility, or heedlessness, thoughtlessness, irresponsibility. Toys lead to the development of that most valuable trait, the protecting instinct, or they generate indifference and utter disregard of both the material and the living object.

It is perhaps needless to emphasize the fact that the toy in itself could never accomplish these results, but the moment it is brought into relationship with the child it begins to affect that child either positively or negatively, as the case may be. This effect is conditioned on many circumstances: the individual nature of the child; the relation which the toy bears to the age of the child—that is, the adaptation of the toy to the child; the quality of the toy, whether it is calculated to incite to activity or whether it is so finished and perfect a thing in itself that it dulls the imagination and checks activity; the number of toys which a child possesses; and, last but not least, the character of the child's home, which vitally affects the relation of the child to his toys.

THE IDEAL TOY

In emphasizing the educational significance of toys we do not minimize their value as a means of entertainment for the child. The truth is that those toys which possess in the highest degree an educational value are the toys that contribute in the largest measure to the entertainment of children. They have a permanent worth, and therefore, from whatever point of view you approach the question—social, economic, or educational—they are the toys that pay the largest interest on your investment.

The little child, if normal, is during his waking hours incessantly active. He must be doing something. He will be doing something; and his elders are sometimes hard pressed to find employment for his seemingly superabundant activity. Toys are one of the means we supply to meet this activity of children, and, if properly selected, they fulfill this purpose happily and adequately.

This leads me to state that the ideal toy is the toy with which the child can do something. It is the toy that absorbs his activity, physical and mental.

There is no more interesting sight than a child absorbed in his play, his lithe body active, responsive, and his mind alert and often creative. Toys have a more or less important part in the plays of children—more, if they are stimulating and suggestive; less, if they are too perfect and complete in themselves. Thus the rag doll and the plain little bisque doll, or even the doll made for the occasion from a shawl, are more stimulating and suggestive in the child's plays than the costly doll elegantly attired. The last is too complete to leave any room for the play of the child's imagination. She is what she is; whereas the cruder dolls can be transformed into babies, little girls, ladies, and the like, and so fit more truly into the creative plays of children.

It should be noted that it is through these creative plays that the child gets a valuable phase of his development. They help him to find himself and to adjust himself to the mysterious world in which he lives.

WHAT IS A SHOVEL WITHOUT A SAND-PILE?

There are many simple and inexpensive toys which are specially valuable for the developing child. Blocks, if adapted to the age of the child, are always a stimulating incentive to play and an agency by which he gains many ideas as well as a means of self-expression. The little pail accompanied by a little shovel, if in proximity to a sand-pile, is a source of great delight to the very little child and provides a legitimate outlet for his activity; but the pail and the shovel not put to use become dead and meaningless. The writer recalls a little girl who used to walk out with her nurse, carrying a little pail and shovel. When the nurse was not looking, she would make a detour from the walk and begin to shovel dirt into her pail. As soon as the nurse missed her she would turn, make a rush and grab the child, brush off her dress, empty the pail, admonish the child to "be good," and pull her back into her sedate and ladylike occupation of walking. Again and again the child would make the effort to utilize her toy, only at last to be carried back to the hotel howling with disappointment. The nurse learned nothing. She was blind to the hunger of this child.

A box of crayons and plenty of good drawing paper of an inexpensive variety, as well as a pair of blunt scissors and paper for cutting, afford both an outlet for the activity of children and a means of entertainment and profit for many a rainy day. One of our well-known illustrators says that he got his start in his profession with a pair of blunt scissors, scraps of paper, and crayons when he was a small lad recovering from an illness.

Water-color paints are another old-fashioned and valuable toy. Tools, both for the garden and for carpentry, are excellent toys, provided they are of good quality so that they are really usable; but, given these, as with the water-color paints, the child must have a legitimate outlet for their use. He must have pictures which he is permitted to paint, a plot of ground where he may play at gardening, wood and nails and some directions so that he may make things that are satisfying with his tools. Otherwise, of course he'll paint up one of your good books, he'll hoe up your plants, and hammer your mahogany chairs. Why shouldn't he? He'd be stupid if he didn't.

The writer remembers a little fellow of four in a home where she once visited, a lusty, strong little chap, whose days were spent, seemingly, in devising mischief. Everything that an active brain and a pair of stout legs and willing hands could accomplish that boy did. "Why, John!" was the wailing cry heard again and again from the mother as she discovered some new depredation of that small boy. That boy's mischief was a plain case of lack of legitimate outlets for tremendous vitality. He needed toys that would absorb and use up his energy. His mother spent her time in pulling him out of mischief instead of studying to understand and supply his needs.

EXPENSIVE AND INEXPENSIVE TOYS

The cost of a toy does not necessarily indicate its value. There are many expensive toys that are distinctly valuable to the developing child—toys that train him to think and to act quickly, toys that stimulate to some degree the inventive spirit; but there are also a great many simple, inexpensive toys that are equally good, giving the child the same training, if not in so attractive a guise. Mechanical and electrical toys are found in large numbers, some of them simply a means to divert a child for a time, many of them truly educative.

The real test of the value of a toy is, Can the child do something with it? Will it employ his activity in a legitimate way? Coupled with this must go the judgment as to whether a particular toy is adapted to the particular individual for whom it is designed. Not merely the personality of the individual must be taken into account, but also his environment. A little boy who lived in a town where he had a large yard space in which to play was presented with a set of freight cars, with tracks, turntable, and switches, made by hand and of wood. Although somewhat crude, this was an admirable toy, and afforded this small boy and his playmates untold pleasure. It called for considerable ingenuity to put the various parts together; it gave the child, in a small way, a knowledge of the working of a railway system, and it afforded a splendid opportunity for the play of his imagination. It had another value in that it suggested and invited co-operative play, and thus the benefits of this toy were extended to other children, and the boy himself was gaining a most valuable experience—that of sharing one's possessions. This plaything which covered yards of space was well adapted to the environment of this particular boy, but fancy what consternation such a gift would occasion a boy's parents living in the restricted quarters of a city apartment!

FITTING THE TOY TO THE AGE

The question of age is another important element to be considered in this problem of adaptation. Toys which delight the child of two generally make little appeal to the child of five or six, while toys which absorb the activity of the child of five or six are far beyond anything but the physical grasp of the child of two years of age. A little girl just past her first birthday was presented at Christmas time with a box of architectural blocks made of wood. The mother, like many another, not being a wise woman, handed the blocks over to this baby instead of putting them away for future use. The child did what any child of her years would be sure to do, grasped them and then threw them about the room. She was at this stage of her development mentally incapable of seeing any other possibility in this material. The result was that before many days some of the blocks were missing, and some minus their delicate minaret-like tops; and, alas! the seeds of a destructive habit were sown in this child's mind.

Blocks are one of the very best of toys, but their educative purpose is defeated when they are not adapted to the age, and thus to the capabilities, of the child. For the very young child the plain cubical blocks are the suitable material. They are what he can use productively. They lend themselves readily to the towers he likes to build and to the "choo-choo" trains that never fail to absorb the interest of the young American. When this material fails to absorb the attention of the child, oblong blocks should be provided, and, still later, blocks presenting a division of the cubical or square blocks, and blocks with a division of the oblong blocks, or something of equal value, and, lastly, at the age of five or six, or even later, according to the degree of development of the child, the elaborate architectural blocks.

When presented in this way, blocks are not only a constant source of delight to children, but are also a means of productive activity, developing the child's creative powers in a sane and healthy fashion.

The little child will sometimes give a remarkable exhibition of selective ability. The writer at one time experimented with a two-year-old boy. She gave him as a plaything the so-called Fifth Gift of the kindergarten, which consists of a box of blocks containing twenty-one whole cubes, six half-cubes (large triangular prisms), and twelve quarter-cubes (small triangular prisms). The child observed these blocks for a moment or two and then deliberately removed all the half and quarter cubes and threw them to one side. This done, he played for a long time happily with the plain square blocks (the cubes), making towers and trains. The experiment was repeated three times, the child going through the same procedure each time. The triangular prisms meant nothing to this two-year-old; they had no suggestion for him; they were simply waste material to be thrown aside. But if these blocks had been given him at the age of five, we would have found him utilizing all the blocks in various constructions; they would then have been suggestive, stimulating material.

SOME OBSERVATIONS ABOUT DOLLS

The doll, from earliest times, has been an ideal toy; and the species doll, though it is not generally recognized, is a form of toy that calls for adaptation to the different stages of child growth. The fascinating rubber doll, the rag doll, the little girl doll, the boy doll, the baby doll, the lady doll, the delightful tiny bisque dolls and paper dolls—all meet needs of varying stages of child growth.

The rubber doll and the rag doll are adapted to the early periods; but the doll dressed in its long baby clothes should come much later, often as late as the age of six, when the maternal instinct is far more evident than at two or three or even four, and needs something upon which to expend itself, for which there is nothing better than this type of doll. How many little girls are there who have literally yearned for a baby doll in long clothes, and have received instead from their devoted parents a wonderful specimen of doll dressed in silk or satin!—a sort of mongrel, as she is neither baby nor little girl nor grown-up lady.

Those fascinating creatures, the tiny bisque dolls, are often a perplexity to mothers who have forgotten their own childhood, or perhaps have failed to catch the significance of many of the experiences of their childhood. "Why," we hear them say, "does Mary spend so much time with those little dolls and pay no attention at all to her beautiful big doll? Last year nothing would do but the big doll, and now she entirely neglects it." And this is true. Mary is now seven or eight years of age—she may be even nine—and her time and energy are all spent upon tiny bisque dolls, to the neglect of the beautiful big doll. "Why is it?" the mother asks. The answer is simple. These dolls meet the little girl's need for some form of productive activity. The big doll and her paraphernalia are too stable, not of a sufficiently flexible nature, to meet her desire to do and to accomplish. In the tiny bisque dolls she finds a medium adapted to her ability upon which to expend her activity—her growing tendency to produce and originate. Witness, for example, the doll's outfit that springs into existence through the activity of industrious fingers and an alert, inventive brain—dresses, coats, hats, and not only these, but the furniture for a house for these dolls is now made by utilizing boxes, spools, and other odds and ends.

Crude, do you tell us that this work is? To be sure it is; but it is honest work, the product of the child's own activity, and into it has gone the joy of achievement and the consciousness of creative power. Do we adults not know what it means to us when we achieve some given aim and the joy that comes to us from anything into which we feel that an element of originality or creativity has entered? Knowing this, cannot we realize what this productive play of the child means to her? It is an act of self-expression as truly as our adult deeds of achievement are, and it is fraught with deep significance.

Some mothers lament this use of activity that might be put to more practical ends. "Why not have the children make dresses for their big dolls, something that would teach them to sew?" is the burden of their lament. Ah, there's the rub! Cannot you see that the making of the wardrobe for the big doll is beyond children of these years? Never deceive yourself with the idea that it is play. The fact is that it is too big a piece of work to be accomplished in a short time; and let it be said right here that if you want to stimulate the productive activity of children, the thing which they are given to do must be something that is accomplished quickly, that has a near, not a remote, result. The work designed for the big doll of necessity would be directed; and what gives significance to the work for the tiny bisque dolls, which the children attack and accomplish with such zest and joy, is the fact that it is an act of self-expression.

At the ages we are considering—seven, eight, and nine—the paper doll competes for attention with the tiny bisque doll. At an earlier age the finished paper doll, with its ready-made outfit, gives great satisfaction to children; but now the doll cut from the fashion book, with the outfit designed by the active mind and made by the industrious fingers of the child, gives greater satisfaction and forms another admirable means of self-expression. What visions of wonderful costumes does a girl of these years conjure up at the sight of sheets of colored tissue paper, paper lace, and adorable shiny paper! Whole wedding trousseaus are prepared from this delectable material, showing how observation, inventiveness and skill in designing, and the power of expression are developing in these young girls.

CONCERNING BOYS

The developing boys, no less than the growing girls, need toys adapted to their increasing powers. They, too, must have something that will stimulate and put to the test their developing powers of observation, of inventiveness, of skill in manual expression. They, too, yearn to produce, to create. A load of slab wood proved a fine plaything for some boys I once knew; a primitive form of dwelling without the use of a nail was the resultant product.

CITY TOYS AND COUNTRY TOYS

The problem of supplying suitable toys is a much simpler one for the parents whose children enjoy the environment of country life than for those whose children are confined within the limits of a city. The child with the incentives which the outdoor world of the country provides largely makes his own play world, and adds to his few and often simple toys playthings of his own creation. His play world is often one rich in imagination, fertile in originality. The children of our big cities who are not favored by summer outings at the shore or in the country lead a much more artificial life. They lack the natural play incentives that the outdoor world of the country affords, as well as the space in which to enact their plays, and hence are more dependent on the purchased toy. For this reason their need of toys adapted to their developing powers is even more urgent than that of the children of the country, and calls for a much more careful study of means and adaptation.

QUALITY VERSUS QUANTITY

It is not an exaggeration to say that the American child suffers from an over-supply rather than an under-supply of toys. His lack is not that of quantity, but of quality—of toys that really fit his requirements, and thus tend both to entertain and develop him. This habit of surfeiting our children with toys is a menace which few parents appreciate, and the few who do appreciate it, too often lack the courage or the initiative to mitigate the evil.

No little child is capable of appreciating or enjoying a large number of toys at one time. If he is of an orderly turn of mind, he may evolve a selective process adapted to time and place, or he may do as a small friend of mine, abetted by her parents, did. Her nursery was lined on three sides with shelves, on which were placed every conceivable type of toy. Her friends were allowed to enter this sacred room and gaze, much as one would do in a toy shop, only here they could not purchase anything and take it away. After their tour of observation they were taken to another room, where they played with her architectural blocks and her dolls.

More often a superabundance of toys develops directly or indirectly a train of unfortunate habits. Destructivity is particularly prominent in this train, for where a succession or a superfluity of toys is assured the virtues of care, responsibility, and protection are generally lacking. And be it remarked that the child's care of his toys is one of the most valuable lessons which he should learn in this period of childhood.

The evil of restlessness, the vacillating disposition, the germ of discontent, may all find their birth in a superfluity of toys. A little neighbor of ours had a habit of watching for her father each night upon his return from business. The cry which we generally heard from this eager young American, as her father approached, was, "What have you brought me?" The father usually produced from the depths of his pocket, if not from a bulky package, some toy, which the child greedily appropriated and for a short time utilized in play. We noted as time went on and our opportunity for observation increased that this child was restless, lacking in even the small degree of stability common to her age. This was particularly marked in relation to her interest in and affection for things. A given thing contented her for a very short time. The insidious germ—desire for change—was working rapidly in her organism. At last one night her father brought her two live bunnies. Now, we thought, here is something living. This surely will make a more lasting appeal to her; but not so. In the afternoon of the next day we noted one of the rabbits lying dead upon the lawn, and before night the second had met the same fate—a twisted neck—and the little lady, all unmindful, was looking for new deeds of conquest and slaughter.

Is it too much to say that in that child's nature were being sown the seeds that lead to the dulling of the affections, to the hardening of the heart, to a thoughtlessness that may extend beyond the material toys and the animal pets to her human brothers and sisters?

I was once invited to view the Christmas gifts which the fond parents had provided for their five children. It was a big display. The indulgent mother pointed out how each one of the children had virtually the same sort of toys—five of every kind—so that there would be no quarreling or disputing as to gifts. I longed to say to her, "Are your children to have no opportunity to exercise the blessed and beneficent privilege of sharing their gifts one with another?"

Is it wide of the mark to say that those parents were sowing for selfishness, that most insidious of all sins?

THE ADULT AND THE TOY

There is no question but that we adults need educating along the line of toys and adaptation. The toy is, or should be, a bringer of joy to our children; it also should be for the little child an educative means in the happiest and most natural manner. The flowering of the human spirit which manifests itself in children's plays is one of the most beautiful expressions of child-life. It rests with us adults whether we shall be bringers of light or a means of stumbling to these little ones.

WEEKLY OUTLINE STUDY OF CURRENT HISTORY

BY J. MADISON GATHANY, A.M.

HOPE STREET HIGH SCHOOL, PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Based on The Outlook of April 30, 1919

Each week an Outline Study of Current History based on the preceding number of The Outlook will be printed for the benefit of current events classes, debating clubs, teachers of history and of English, and the like, and for use in the home and by such individual readers as may desire suggestions in the serious study of current history.—THE EDITORS.

[Those who are using the weekly outline should not attempt to cover the whole of an outline in any one lesson or study. Assign for one lesson selected questions, one or two propositions for discussion, and only such words as are found in the material assigned. Or distribute selected questions among different members of the class or group and have them report their findings to all when assembled. Then have all discuss the questions together.]

I—INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

A. Topic: Korea's Plea for Independence; Japan and Korea.

Reference: Pages 725, 726.

Questions:

Note.—This topic should be made the basis of a study of the history of Korea and Japan's rise to supremacy in the Far East. 1. Explain why Korea at the present time is making a plea for independence from Japan. 2. What is The Outlook's attitude toward the independence of Korea? What are its reasons? 3. Tell, with reasons, whether you believe in the absolute independence of Korea. 4. If Korea should become independent, name and discuss some of the problems and tasks you think would be hers. 5. Make several comparisons between the demands of the Sinn Feiners for Irish independence and those of the Koreans for independence. 6. What does The Outlook believe the true policy for Japan and for Korea is? Do you expect this policy to be executed? Reasons. 7. Describe briefly the struggle of China, Russia, and Japan for the possession of Korea. 8. Explain how Japan finally annexed Korea. 9. Give an account of the Portsmouth Treaty and the part played in it by Theodore Roosevelt. To whom were the terms more creditable, Russia or Japan? Reasons. 10. Discuss what, in your opinion, the effect of the world war will be on the position of Japan. 11. Do you believe the United States should be decidedly friendly to Japan? Discuss at length. 12. You will find "The Mastery of the Far East," by A. J. Brown (Scribners), a most helpful book in the study of this topic.

B. Topic: The Black Wave; Bolshevism; "Conquering" Russia.

Reference: Pages 734-738; 730, 731.

Questions:

1. Make a numbered list of definitions of Bolshevism as given in this editorial correspondence by Mr. Abbott. (This should prove to be a very valuable exercise.) 2. State and discuss the effects of Bolshevism in Russia. 3. Who are the Russian patriots? State and explain their aim. 4. What, according to the men interviewed by Mr. Abbott, could the Allies do for Russia? 5. Does The Outlook believe the Allies, including the United States, should aid Russia? What are its reasons? Do you believe they should? Tell why or why not. 6. Explain the relations between Bolshevism and Germanism as seen in this correspondence. 7. What, in the belief of Baron Korff, constitutes the German menace? Give reasons why you do or do not agree with him. 8. What seem to you to be the ends and objects sought by the Bolsheviks? Discuss whether these are in any respects worthy. 9. For what reasons does Lloyd George believe that military intervention in Russia is inadvisable? (See page 730.) Restate The Outlook's criticism of his position. 10. What is The Outlook's Russian policy? Do you think the Allies should adopt it? Reasons. 11. State specifically in what ways Bolshevism is an enemy of political and industrial democracy. 12. You will do well to read John Spargo's new book called "Bolshevism," published by Harpers.

II—NATIONAL AFFAIRS

Topic: A Millionaire's Opinion of Education.

Reference: Editorial, pages 731, 732.

Questions:

1. What is Mr. Woolworth's opinion of education? Do you consider it adequate? Reasons. 2. What is The Outlook's proof of its statement: "If it had not been for the classical and scientific work of our colleges and universities, Mr. Woolworth's 'two terms in a business college' would have been of little help to him"? 3. The Outlook believes that our educational system is imperfect, needs revitalizing and readjustment. Explain wherein this is so. 4. "But to condemn it out of hand is both foolish and harmful," continues The Outlook. Write about two hundred words on this statement. 5. Explain how our schools can produce an educated and intelligent public opinion. 6. Discuss whether the world war has been worth while from an educational point of view. 7. Those interested in education will find valuable ideas in "Industry and Humanity," by W. L. M. King (Houghton Mifflin), and in "The Colleges in War Time and After," by P. R. Kolbe (Appleton).

III—PROPOSITIONS FOR DISCUSSION

(These propositions are suggested directly or indirectly by the subject-matter of The Outlook, but not discussed in it.)

1. Anarchy is preferable to Bolshevism.
2. Education in America is thoroughly democratic.

IV—VOCABULARY BUILDING

(All of the following words and expressions are found in The Outlook for April 30, 1919. Both before and after looking them up in the dictionary or elsewhere, give their meaning in your own words. The figures in parentheses refer to pages on which the words may be found.)

Self-determination, revolution, insurrection, missionaries (725); Bolshevism, Prussianism (731); apolitic, autocracy, impertinence, callousness, prejudice, trilingual, patriotism (735); Germanism, virile nation, Kultur (736); benign, outlaw, chemistry, higher education (731).

Vanguard of fleet of 88 Liberty Trucks passing through Oakville, Delaware County, Ind., in August, 1918, over Tarvia Road built in 1918. Note perfect condition of road after two years of hard service.

Every Community should have roads like these—

HERE is the story of how Delaware County, Indiana, got good roads, as told by the County Surveyor. Everyone interested in good roads should read it.

"Our first Tarvia road was built in 1914. Between 1914 and 1918 we constructed sixteen streets and roads, with a total area of about 2,880,000 square feet.

"Some of these are main streets in the city of Muncie, others are main roads subject to heavy traffic, while others replaced low-lying gravel roads that used to wash-out at every overflow of the river.

"Every Tarvia road and street in Delaware County has given uniform satisfaction. No repairs have been necessary."

"Our so-called 'hard' roads, built of brick or concrete are often claimed as permanent construction, but we have in this county brick roads and streets built less than a decade ago that are almost impassable and must soon be rebuilt. New material will be required because the old brick cannot be used again

"On the other hand, when a Tarvia road wears, a little stone is added, Tarvia is applied, and the road is as good as, or better than, new.

"With proper maintenance, our Tarvia roads will last ten to twenty years. The cost of maintenance will be small and the entire road can be rebuilt at less than half the cost of a brick pavement.

"Considering the various types of road from a purely financial standpoint, one does not need to be skilled in higher mathematics to arrive at the correct answer." (Signed) S. Horace Weber, County Surveyor Tarvia is a coal-tar preparation for use in constructing new macadam roads or repairing old ones. It reinforces the road surface and makes it not only mudless and dustless, but also water-proof, frost-proof and automobile-proof. A few Tarvia Roads in any community will add to property values and reduce taxes.

THE THRIFT MOVEMENT

I note with interest your article on "Thrift Insurance" in the March 5 issue of The Outlook. I believe thrift is as necessary in peace times as in war. The war has shown some things we can do along savings lines—some things we never dreamed possible. Various agencies organized to improve citizenship standards will doubtless keep the thrift message before the people after the Government loan campaigns are over.

This subject of perpetuating the thrift impulse is the very problem which a group of New York bankers and business men, known as the Thrift Committee of the Industrial Department, International Young Men's Christian Association, is organized to assist to a solution. The programme, as designed, is calculated to help men in industry to think straight about their money matters in the realm of earning, spending, saving, investing, giving. The machinery which it uses to accomplish this purpose has proved very successful.

The Y. M. C. A. has found it practical (1) to promote savings clubs in the big industrial concerns; (2) to teach men the necessity of making family budgets, keeping records of expenditures, and proportional division of the income, by thrift exhibits, advertising campaigns, educational classes, shop talks, and stereopticon lectures; (3) to conduct home buying and beautifying campaigns; (4) to celebrate thrift week; (5) to co-operate with banks and insurance firms in getting men to open savings accounts and take out insurance; (6) to cash pay checks, open accounts for men, deposit money, assist in making investments; (7) to give vocational advice and assistance.

Savings clubs have proved a very valuable machine in promoting saving and investing. These clubs have also been useful as a nucleus to promote thrift educational work by exhibits, debates, discussions, etc., work out family budgets, study marketing and purchasing value, and interest other industrial centers in a like programme.

Results have proved both the hypothesis and the practicality of the programme. The Y. M. C. A., in order that its slogan "to meet the needs of men" might be really true, has made the economic programme the fifth part of its fivefold programme. Many other big institutions have felt compelled to include this factor in their programmes. And the indorsement of big business men like Mr. E. C. Delafield, of the Franklin Trust Company; Irving T. Bush, of the Bush Terminal Company, of Brooklyn, New York; Colgate Hoyt, of Colgate Hoyt & Co.; J. S. Alexander, of the National Bank of Commerce, and many others, bears eloquent and complete testimony to the good and the efficiency accomplished by the Thrift Department's efforts.

It is neither the object nor the desire of the Y. M. C. A.'s Thrift Department to assist men to the acquisition of fortunes. To teach a man to live safely, sanely, and happily within his income and at the same time paddle the canoe of his abilities and earning capacity up the stream of success is the sole purpose. The resulting betterment in the fiber of our citizenship will not only help the Nation and the individual in a time of special need, but constitute both the glory and the satisfaction of the Industrial Department of the International Young Men's Christian Association.

WALT WHITMAN

BY EDNA DAVIS ROMIG

ON May 31 a hundred years will have elapsed since the birth of Walt Whitman. He is to-day quite as important a figure in American literature as he was when he died, in 1892. His recognition is not based, therefore, on personal or literary eccentricity, but on solid worth.

President Lincoln, standing one day during the war before a window in the White House, saw Whitman slowly saunter by. He followed him with his eyes, relates Mr. Burroughs, and, turning, said to those about him:

"Well, he looks like a man."

In any study of the personality of Whitman the student is met at the outset by a most amazing type of criticism—and just as puzzling a volume of expression by the poet himself. A pathologist has seen in him the full case of insanity, substantiating the theory by the fact that his youngest brother was an imbecile and his eldest brother died insane, the disease in Whitman taking only another form, and that in full evidence in his "Leaves of Grass." How prevalent was this idea is shown in the fact that Dr. Bucke, a well-known alienist and for nineteen years superintendent of an insane institution, for fifteen years the private physician of Whitman, whose later years were enfeebled through the results of gangrene contracted in his "Wound Dresser" days in Civil War hospitals, has written a detailed study of madness, from this basis making an intensive study to disprove the fact. Devotees have even seen in Whitman a nineteenth-century divinity. Others have seen in him only a colloquial caricature of the lower classes, one who reveled in uncouthness and dissipation. Still others see in him the inspired poet, a Shakespeare of democracy.

The fact is, Walt Whitman positively refuses to be pigeon-holed or card-indexed.

"I charge you forever reject those who would expound me, for I cannot expound myself. . . . Do I contradict myself?
Very well, then I contradict myself;
(I am large—I contain multitudes.)"

As to the matter of personal appearance there is apparently a unanimity of opinion. Walt must have undeniably presented a magnificent physique. The daguerreotype of 1854 gives the impression of an unusual vitality. Of a later period Mr. Burroughs writes vividly and sympathetically: "In person Whitman was large and tall, above six feet, with a breezy, open-air look. . . . The full beauty of his face and head did not appear till he was past sixty. After that I have little doubt it was the finest head this age or country has seen. . . . It seemed to me his face steadily refined and strengthened with age."

Horace Traubel, the Boswell of Whitman, declares that he always felt a tonic emanation from the man. Of this quality, termed by one disciple "the sunshine of that dynamic personality," there seems to be ample corroboration. Restrained and calm critics refer to it and analyze the quality in terms of personal magnetism, although it takes Mr. Binns to record of their first meeting that he was "almost amazed by the beauty and majesty of his person and the gracious air of purity that surrounded and permeated him. . . . A sort of spiritual intoxication set in."

But Whitman, the critic of himself, is not so high-flown, so devotional, in his attitude.

A rude child of the people!—no imitation—no foreigner—no dilettante democrat . . . likes to be called by his given name, and nobody at all need mister him—can laugh with laughers—is not prejudiced one mite against the Irish—talks readily with niggers—does not make a stand on being a gentleman, nor on learning nor manners—would leave a select soirée of elegant people any time to go with tumultuous men, roughs, receive their caresses and welcome, listen to their noise, oaths, smut, fluency, laughter, repartee. The effects he produces in his poems are no effects of artists. You may feel the unconscious teachings of a fine brute, but will never feel the artificial teaching of a fine writer or speaker.

From his devotees we may expect a certain amount of enthusiasm, even of fanaticism. Dr. Bucke, Mr. Traubel, Mr. Harned, the O'Connors, all make Whitman the seer and prophet of inspired vision. There is Mrs. Gilchrist, a woman of brilliant mentality and culture and refinement, who became a most intimate friend and saw in Whitman much of power. And there is John Burroughs, whose forcible studies lead one to interpret this man sympathetically. John Burroughs was much with Whitman, and pronounced as the most vital thing about him his large and loving personality. Thoreau, Emerson, Ingersoll, Trowbridge, Andrew Carnegie, all these men were strangely drawn to him by the magnetic influence of Whitman's personality.

One of the most satisfying proofs of this emanating quality of beneficence, the outgoing virtue of his personal self, is the influence he exerted in the hospital wards during the "Wound Dresser" days. An atmosphere of calming and soothing went with Walt Whitman down those halls of pain. His mere presence, many say, was a potent anæsthetic, and the suffering boys learned to call for Walt. This period of service, too, was the one which gave to him the most satisfaction.

Of temperamental traits perhaps the magnificent optimism that glows through most of his poetry is one of the most fundamental. It is the one that gives rise to his faith in his fellow-man, that stimulates his benevolence, the touchstone of his love and sympathy. It is doubtless this essence, together with a certain wistful yearning, that reacted upon William Dean Howells when he wrote:

He was often at Pfaff's. . . . He had a fine head with a cloud of Jovian hair . . . and gentle eyes that looked most kindly into mine and seemed to wish the liking which I instantly gave him. . . . Our acquaintance was summed up in that glance and the grasp of his mighty fist upon my hand. . . . Some years later I saw him for the last time. . . . Then, as always, he gave me the sense of a sweet and true soul, and I felt in him a spiritual dignity which I will not try to reconcile with the printing of . . . Emerson's letter. The apostle of the rough, the uncouth, was the gentlest person; his barbaric yawp translated into terms of social encounter was an address of singular quiet. . . . He was a liberating force, a very imperial anarchy in literature. . . . I like his prose; there is a genial and comforting quality, very rich and cordial, such as I felt him to be when I met him in person. . . . It is still something neighborly, brotherly,

WHETHER you approach it as one who enjoys a record of adventurous days afoot in strange places or as one who, like the author, is deeply stirred by the Biblical associations of the Holy Land, you will enjoy

fatherly, and so I felt him to be when the benign old man looked on me and helpfully spoke to me.

Closely related to this sanguine attribute of optimism is that other all-prevailing characteristic of Whitman, referred to by Mr. Howells, discerned by all who have known the man—his tenderness, his vast compassion, his extreme fellow-feeling.

Sympathy in Whitman is both general and specific, both abstract and concrete. There is a sweeping sense of brotherhood which becomes for him a generalized, universal emotion, expressed for every nation, every race, every degree. It goes out alike to the stranger, the unknown comrade, a fugitive slave, a common prostitute, one shortly to die, a Seminole prisoner. His sympathy becomes nobly productive and splendidly concrete in the hospital days at Washington where he served unceasingly. "Specimen Days" and "November Boughs" bear the imprint of the emotions of this time. The broader phase of sympathy is one of his own literary ideals:

I also sent out "Leaves of Grass" to arouse and set flowing in men's and women's hearts, young and old, endless streams of living, pulsing love and friendship, directly from them to myself, now and forever. To this terrible, irrepressible yearning (surely more or less down underneath in most human souls)—this never-satisfied appetite for sympathy and this boundless offering of sympathy, this universal democratic comradeship.

And from this springs the scope and inclusiveness of his sympathy, tuning himself with the universe, feeling with all things animate, and, in his mystical moods, with things inanimate. He identifies himself with all personalities, reads into his experience the experiences of humanity or into humanity the experiences of his own being:

"I am the mate and companion of people, all just as immortal and fathomless as myself; (They do not know how immortal, but I know.) . . . In all people I see myself—none more, and not one a barley-corn less; And the good or bad I say of myself, I say of them. . . . I am he attesting sympathy. . . . I encompass worlds, and volumes of worlds."

And this brings us to another riddle of Whitman's personality, namely, his egotism. He who goes deeply into a study of Whitman will not remain long ignorant of the fact that he was eccentric, erratic in many respects, and that he did many things conspicuously ill-advised. But the egotism that troubles the one approaching Whitman for the first time is the stupendous claim he makes for himself.

First of all, one should not forget that again and again egotism in "Leaves of Grass" is used almost synonymously with personality:

"I will effuse egotism, and show it underlying all—and I will be the bard of personality."

Often, however, the I of Walt Whitman, his own peculiar identity, is mixed up with this universal ego until there is obscurity, if not direct contradiction. In "A Song of Myself" there is a predominant autobiographical ego, which, however, is so paralleled with the identities of humanity in general that the reader becomes hopelessly confused or loses patience with what appears to be Whitman's colossal egotism. Burroughs declares that it is not Walt Whitman the private individual who speaks, but Walt Whitman as the spokesman of American democracy. It seems a more satisfactory explanation of all the varying phases of this, however, to deduce the theory that egotism in Whitman rises in a series, or is of three kinds: (1) the autobiographical I, the Walt Whitman of his own personal environment; (2) the ego that sees with himself innumerable counterpart identities,

"I celebrate myself and sing myself,
And what I assume you shall assume.
For every atom belonging to me as good belongs to you;"

and (3) in all personality the egotism which is a part of God, the transcendental ego, where each identity becomes intrinsically an ego-theist. This last variety is very much a part of Whitman's philosophy and leads into many high-handed declarations in all of his earlier writings.

"Divine am I inside and out, and I make holy whatever I touch or am touched from. . .

This head more than churches, Bibles and all creeds.

If I worship one thing more than another, it shall be the spread of my own body, or any part of it. . . .

I hear and behold God in every object. . . .
In the faces of men and women I see God, and in my own face in the glass;
I find letters of God dropt in the street—and every one is signed by God's name."

The touchstone of Whitman's appeal to European critics, as well as to his comparatively few readers at home, is the virility of his writings. One of his favorite words is "brawn." Another is "athletic." He exalts the perfection of the physical. His Utopia is to be a race of stalwart sons and athletic daughters vitalized by great free souls. America for him means hardihood and strength and vigor and independence. Perhaps he has most powerfully expressed this in a sweeping poem translated into many languages and by many Europeans accepted as the index to Whitman's American poetry:

"O you youths, Western youths,
So impatient, full of action, full of manly pride and friendship.
Plain I see you, Western youths, see you trampling with the foremost,
Pioneers! O Pioneers! . . .

All the past we leave behind;
We debouch upon a newer, mightier world,
varied world,
Fresh and strong the world we seize, world of labor and the march,
Pioneers! O Pioneers!"

When Whitman saw the mountain and canyon wonders of Colorado, he exclaimed, "Here I find the law of my own poems!" The big things in nature filled him with that ecstasy he flings into his lines, that rapport which becomes one of his unpleasant mannerisms, an all but frenzied succession of exclamations. "Just as picturesque England lies back of Tennyson," says Mr. Burroughs, "craggy Scotland back of Carlyle, so America as a whole, our huge movements, our sprawling, sublime, unkempt nature lies back of Walt Whitman."

But even beyond this grandeur of natural background, and better than this, is the sanctity of the human body.

"For Whitman," says Mr. Symonds, "the body has a mystic value, not merely because of its exceeding beauty and delightfulness, but also because it is verily the temple of the divinest of all things we know, the human soul."

Into the woof of this vitality are knit many of the attributes of his optimism and sympathy, and wefted with his virility is the peculiar fabric of his egotism. But in any complete consideration of Whitman's temperamental traits there are others not so sanguine. Here and there are signs of a morbid pessimism, a slight hint of the cynic, melodious expression of grief, a Tennysonian quality in passages of "Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking," with its touch of threnody and a dirge-like movement.

And it is this man, sometimes brooding, this man who realizes things as fundamentally joyous and sweet, the sanguine man, who can be also the choleric old fellow, irascible under circumstances. Doubtless here, too, is the source of his stubbornness. Mr. Trowbridge calls the characteristic "just plain cussedness." He held tenaciously to his own opinions, no matter how convincing were the arguments pitted against him—as numerous of his friends and contemporaries had occasion to know.

Irresponsibility is also in evidence in many phases. The 1855 edition of "Leaves of Grass" is full of errors in type, spelling, punctuation, and crammed with loose terms. Any one reading the multitudinous stray manuscripts, letters, and diary jottings knows how altogether unorganized and unformed they are. In both his poetry and prose there is little that can be called construction; grammatical errors, hanging phrases, long passages in most flagrant incoherence, distressingly incomplete sentences, occur with supreme nonchalance. There are all the earmarks of carelessness, and Walt himself refers to his writings in some of his favorite terms—"random," "mélange," "hiatus," "haphazard," "hurrygrams."

From the irresponsible there is but one step to the unconventional. Always and everywhere is Whitman swinging free from convention, tradition, form. This, as well as his avid eye for the pictorial, may explain the queer garb he affected—the loose gray suit, the broad collar, low opened shirt, the favorite knit coat, the soft slouch hat.

It takes only a superficial acquaintance with Whitman to realize that his gospel is naturalness. Every person has within himself the intrinsic standard for manners, beliefs, government. Look into the tablets of your own personality and live—that is the burden of his writings. Everything for the individual, is his slogan. Whitman is never an Anarchist (that in face of some of his "pose" lines, particularly those in "To a Foiled European Revolutionaire"), nor is he ever a rabid revolutionist; he is, however, a great deal of an iconoclast.

Perhaps one of Whitman's greatest voids is a lack of humor. Ruskin laments this, and the consequent incongruity of his writings. It is said that this absence was not conspicuous in personal contact. Mr. Trowbridge in his reminiscences refers to a gathering held in honor of Whitman where the most genuine sociability had been in progress. One of the guests called attention to the lateness of the hour, when another member placed a book before the face of the clock. Mr. Trowbridge suggested, "Put 'Leaves of Grass' there. No one can see through that." There was a general burst of appreciative laughter, which Whitman shared with consummate zest. If he had possessed the quality of another's view-point or the spice of humor as a criterion in consideration of his writings, he might have spared himself some of the ridicule he received and spared us some of the impatience we experience in the jars and bumps of his theories and discomfort in his style.

Whitman's vision carries us through every conceivable experience, the which we might laud in the name of a superb imagination were we carried along by the hypnosis of the mystic. But, the mesmerism failing, there remains much of the ugly, the monotonous, and the absurd in these categories. The uninitiate, in meeting these interminable lists, accuses Whitman of being a good deal of a wastrel, often knowing no economy. His method we attribute to sloth, for instead of concentrating, focusing on one telling, suggestive term, he fills pages with these endless inventories. Whether Whitman did share with the Orientals this vague mystic strain, or whether, in his omnivorous appreciation of everything, in his indiscriminating belief that all experiences and all materials were equally good for him to celebrate, he simply failed in his judgment and psychology, will be a matter for long and productive debate.

And this leads immediately into another consideration of Whitman's personality in regard to his ruling ideas, the motives of his poetry, the theses of his prose. These traits of temperament are the qualities that lie back of all of his unusual writings. It is only an arbitrary division that separates his optimism, his sympathy, his egotism and virility, his unconventionality, sensuousness, and mysticism, from the themes he takes for "Leaves of Grass."

"My comrade,

For you to share with me two greatneesses—a third one rising inclusive and more resplendent,

The greatness of Love and Democracy—and the greatness of Religion."

Love, democracy, religion—this is the substance of Whitman's poetry.

FICTION

Gentleman Ranker (The), and Other Plays. By Leon Gordon. The Four Seas Company, Boston.

His Wife's Job. By Grace Sartwell Mason. Illustrated. D. Appleton & Co., New York.

Diverging Roads. By Rose Wilder Lane. The Century Company, New York.

This is the story of an ingenuous young girl who wanders out into life hoping to make a way for herself so that she may marry the struggling young man of her heart. She doesn't marry him, but instead marries a brilliant scoundrel. The record of her disillusionment is moving; she develops remarkable business ability, and her experience as a pupil in a "fake" telegraph school, as a seller of land on installments, as an advertisement writer, and finally as a magazine and newspaper worker, is related with realism. The events take place on the Pacific coast, and the local color of the fast life of San Francisco, of the oil districts, and of the fruit-raising country is well rendered.

Gift (The). By Margaret Prescott Montague. E. P. Dutton & Co., New York.

A story of an ebbing faith and its return, of an expiring hope and its recovery. It is more than a parable, more than a prose poem, more than a sermon, yet something of all three—a well-told drama of spiritual experience in which a service of love brings back life to both the rescuer and the rescued.

He Made His Wife His Partner. By Henry Irving Dodge. Illustrated. Harper & Brothers, New York.

The author of "Skinner's Dress Suit" has a happy knack of putting optimism and cheerfulness into a story without spoiling the fun by preaching. It was a farmer who in this story became prosperous and

HAPPY today is he who has the gift of reading. The choice of all the beautiful and wholesome thoughts of many yesterdays lies before him, instantly available as a buffer against the ever recurring discordant things of life. For guidance, for counsel, he also turns to his friendly books—and in the reading of them all uncovers in himself hidden sources of strength and initiative. To all who would cultivate this gift of reading are recommended the books of the ABINGDON PRESS whose imprint for 130 years has stood for the highest ideals in the publishing field. Some recent publications are listed below:

THE TRAGEDY OF LABOR A Monograph in Folk Philosophy By WILLIAM RILEY HALSTED

A practical treatment of themes occupying the attention of the student and of the man on the street. A fine piece of clear thinking and lucid writing.

16 mo. 108 pages. Cloth. Net, 50 cents, Postpaid.

FIGHTING FOR A NEW WORLD By CHARLES W. DANEY

A series of Constructive Essays dealing with To-day and To-morrow. Some of the titles are "A Better Era," "True Preparedness," and "Fighting for a New World." Some of these essays were made the basis of efforts by Progressives to depose the author from the Presidency of the University of Cincinnati.

12 mo. 112 pages. Cloth. Net, 75 cents, Postpaid.

THE CLEAN SWORD By LYNN HAROLD HOUGH

What is the relation of the war to reconstruction? How does a soldier become a builder? Can this war be made a highway to permanent peace? How is the new world to be made from the material of the old? Such questions are lifted and answered in a fashion which has far reaching significance in Professor Hough's new book, "The Clean Sword."

12 mo. 212 pages. Cloth. Net, $1.00, Postpaid.

THE CONFESSIONS OF A BROWNING LOVER

By JOHN WALKER POWELL

Browning lovers are on the increase, for which Mr. Powell's confessions are certain to strike a responsive chord in many hearts. He returns again and again to his thesis that Browning is primarily a poet, an artist. "He never saw pure white light, as such, but as made up of all the colors of the rainbow." "There are frequent quotations and the one who has never read a line of Browning would finish the book possessed of valuable information.—National Enquirer.

Cr. 8 vo. 248 pages. Cloth. Net, $1.00, Postpaid.

THE PEACEFUL LIFE A Study in Spiritual Hygiene By OSCAR KUHN

"After the Bible there is no influence so beneficent on the serene life as the works of Plato," says Professor Kuhn, who occupies the chair of literature in Wesleyan University. "We believe," he says, "the times are ripe for a new interpretation of that religion which is sense and taste for the infinite, and as essentially a part of human nature as either knowledge or action." Hence, he leads the reader through a really delightful browsing over the whole field of human aspiration for soul expression and satisfaction.—San Francisco Chronicle.

12 mo. 234 pages. Net, $1.00, Postpaid.

THE MASTER QUEST By WILL B. WOODRILL

It is the contention of the author that "man is ever questing greatness. He vigorously protests against being insignificant." The satisfaction of that quest is to be found in God. In Him, and Him alone, one can find completeness. "Above all," says the author, "Christianity is the religion of a Person. Sometimes we forget this most obvious fact and come to think it consists of Articles of Religion, of Longer or Shorter Catechisms, of Confessions of Faith and proceedings of councils." "Many will find in 'The Master Quest' a fresh discussion of some of the most important truths connected with our religious life and will be helped into a clearer appreciation of these eternal verities.—Zion Herald.

happy by making a partner out of his wife, but the method has universal possibilities.

Ma Pettengill. By Harry Leon Wilson. Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City.

A leisurely, ruminating, whimsical woman owner and manager of a cattle ranch, Ma Pettengill has to be coaxed into telling the histories of the queer people and happenings that have aroused her ire or sympathy. "Ma" herself is the best character in the book. Her fun is native, racy, and penetrating.

Mildred Carver, U. S. A. By Martha Bensley Bruere. The Macmillan Company, New York.

A look ahead into an American future in which instead of universal military service we shall have just plain universal public service by and for all men and women. Every boy and girl who becomes of age must devote a year to this obligatory service on a farm, with a public utility, in sanitary work, or otherwise. Rich and poor, Jew and Gentile, the educated and the ignorant, accept this burden as part of their National obligation. They are thus thrown into intimacy with one another, profit personally by the democratic association, and produce economic results of value. The story as a story has animation and rapid action.

BOOKS FOR YOUNG FOLKS

Fairies' Annual (The). Presented by Cecil Starr Johns. Illustrated. The John Lane Company, New York.

This is a delightful book. What child is not interested in such natural phenomena as the Glow-Worm Lighter, the Will o' the Wisp, and the Rain Fairy? It is just possible, too, that some grown-up people may also feel their fascination.

Young Folks Treasury (The). Edited by Hamilton Wright Mabie, Edward Everett Hale, William Byron Forbush. In 12 vols. Vol. I—Childhood's Favorites and Fairy Stories. Vol. II—Myths and Legendary Heroes. Vol. III—Classic Tales and Everyday Stories. Vol. IV—Modern Tales and Animal Stories. Vol. V—The Animal World. Vol. VI—Travels and Adventures. Vol. VII—Heroes and Patriots. Vol. VIII—Science, Invention, and Plant Life. Vol. IX—Men and Women of Achievement. Vol. X—Ideal Home Life. Vol. XI—Golden Hours with the Poets. Vol. XII—Music and Art. The University Society, New York.

The new revision of this well-edited set of books makes the reviewer envious of the children of to-day. What treasures are here for the boy or girl who likes to read! And for the child who doesn't like to read, what interesting pictures, many in color, that will be sure to lure him on to the love of reading! Here are the children's classics side by side with sketches of heroes of the recent war; accounts of new inventions and tales of the adventures of knights of old; famous songs, with words and music; true stories for the matter-of-fact boy and interesting fiction for the imaginative girl; amusements for rainy days and long evenings. A volume issued by the same publishers and edited by Caroline B. Burrell and W. B. Forbush, entitled "The Mother's Book," admirably supplements the set with helpful hints for parents.

MUSIC, PAINTING, AND OTHER ARTS

Dutch Landscape Etchers of the Seventeenth Century. By William Aspenwall Bradley. Illustrated. The Yale University Press, New Haven.

Prints and Drawings by Frank Brangwyn. With Some Other Phases of His Art, by Walter Shaw Sparrow. The John Lane Company, New York.

The fortunate people who treasure one of Mr. Brangwyn's etchings for their very own will feel that they must have this handsome book, with its fine illustrations and its vigorous comments by Mr. Sparrow; others, who regard the ownership of one of those etchings as beyond them in these times, may well feel that here is a pretty good substitute for the unattainable.

BIOGRAPHY

Richard Cobden; The International Man. By J. A. Hobson. Illustrated. Henry Holt & Co., New York.

Richard Cobden is known throughout the English-speaking world as the great apostle of international free trade. He was one of the chief founders of England's modern financial and industrial supremacy because, by his almost single-handed overthrow of the Corn Laws and thus of the English protective system, he opened the way for that world trade which during the last sixty years has been the foundation of England's world power. The present volume is not a biography in the accepted sense of that term, but is a collection of letters, with comment and interpretation, that display the various phases of Cobden's international but practical mind. To the student of political science Mr. Hobson's book will be of both use and interest because of the light it sheds, at the present crisis in world relationships, on the progress of English thought and policies in international affairs.

Theodore Roosevelt: The Boy and the Man. By James Morgan. New Edition. Illustrated. The Macmillan Company, New York.

HISTORY, POLITICAL ECONOMY, AND POLITICS

Alfred the Great, the Truth Teller; Maker of England, 848-899. By Beatrice Adelaide Lees. Illustrated. (Heroes of the Nations.) G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

Not all readers will be interested in delving into the mingled fact and myth which constitute our material for a picture of Alfred the Great, but none can deny the skill with which this material has been used by the author in making a lifelike portrait of this British hero of old. The book will be highly useful to those who wish to read a popular account of some of the beginnings of English history, and one which embodies the most recent research.

British Revolution and the American Democracy (The). An Interpretation of British Labour Programmes. By Norman Angell. B. W. Huebsch, New York.

Chaos in Europe (The). By Frederick Moore. Introduction by Charles W. Eliot, LL.D. G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

This author, well known as a newspaper correspondent, enjoys the advantage of years of residence in China, Russia, and the Balkan States. His opinions, whether as to present military and political situations or as to future foreign policies, are clearly stated. In this latest volume from his pen he describes the methods of the Bolsheviks, in which we clearly see that, instead of a liberation for Russia, there was only plunder for Lenine and Trotsky. Mr. Moore's conclusion is that "what Russia could have been, she might still be," for she has able men who will come to the front if opportunity be given. To this end "it is necessary for the Allies to devise the means to help them, not excluding the use of armed forces." There is little doubt that, contrary to the President's view, "the pressure of Allied and American forces in Russia would help to stabilize the country quickly." Passing from the reconstruction of Russia to the reconstruction of Europe, the author would also see America play a leading part, for we have not only "supreme power and wealth," but, what is

BLIND ALLEY

By W. L. GEORGE

"BLIND ALLEY" is a long novel, dealing with political and social conditions in war time. Four years of war have wrought a change in the womanhood of England, and it is this change that Mr. George mirrors in this big, fearlessly written novel of a typical English family in war time.

The Chicago Daily News said of "BLIND ALLEY":

"A wonderful book. A deep sympathy and understanding of men and women. A cynical idealism—ideals of the highest, cynical because George knows they are too beautiful to be possible. . . . 'Blind Alley' is an extraordinary novel. But it is more than that. It is a cry in the night."

"AGAINST THE WINDS" is a powerful analytical novel, invested with the qualities of romance and dramatic suspense that cannot fail to appeal to a wide reading public. The story of Naomi Tway's struggle Against the Winds—of poverty—of an unsuitable marriage—of a love that finally comes to possess her recklessly—is rich in unusual incidents.

The New York Times said of "AGAINST THE WINDS":

"Conceived and written in a spirit of romance, the novel is dramatic and holds the reader's attention throughout—An entertaining and vivid story, with an abundance of variety and color."

Brand Whitlock's BELGIUM

By far the most important book of the Twentieth Century—the complete story of the heart of the war, by the United States Minister to Belgium, a great diplomat, a distinguished author—the only American whom the Germans permitted to leave Belgium with the diaries he had kept during the invasion.

In the opinion of many eminent men "Belgium" is the most valuable literary work which has grown out of the war. Next to their King, Brand Whitlock is most beloved of the Belgians. Day by day he stood between the invaders and their victims; night by night he recorded every detail of the brutal story. With his very soul seared by the tragedy, he has given the world a book that will live forever—a book that all Americans may be proud of as the work of an American.

Problem of a National Budget (The). By William Franklin Willoughby. D. Appleton & Co., New York.

Movement for Budgetary Reform in the States (The). By William Franklin Willoughby. D. Appleton & Co., New York.

The problem of a budget, whether for the Nation or for the States, is certainly urgent. These volumes, by a well-known expert, ought to be the most serious contribution yet made to a popular understanding of conditions. Mr. Willoughby discusses the nature of the problem and the efforts to work it out. He shows just what has been done not only here but abroad, especially in Great Britain, and he makes it clear that the next step to be taken is an establishment by Congress of a National commission on the adoption of a budget. But whether Congress does this or not public opinion is crystallizing with gratifying rapidity as to this conviction that the will of the people cannot be intelligently formulated or expressed unless the people have adequate means for knowing currently how Government affairs have been conducted, their present condition, and the future programme.

RELIGION AND PHILOSOPHY

World Facts and America's Responsibility. By Cornelius H. Patton, D.D. Association Press, New York.

A small book, but electrical. Its successive chapters exhibit ten world facts as vividly as moving pictures on an illuminated screen, and with climactic effect. These facts mark the dawn of world peace as beginning a new era, from which to date distinctly modern history. The renaissance of Asia has brought East and West to clasp hands in a glorious partnership. Parallelizing the decadence of non-Christian religions confessed by spokesmen for China, India, and Japan is a victorious advance of Christianity not seen since the first century. A new world-consciousness appears, a new nationalism with a sense of national responsibility, a new world-unity as the basis for world-brotherhood. Asia meanwhile cries loudly to America for light and leading; and Britain and America have united in a fellowship of service to mankind. Democracy has become the world's organizing principle, and needs Jesus Christ to solve its perilous problems. A new idealism, cleansing, practical, beneficent, has sprung up. War has set charity in the center of the stage. Finally, while the Church is girding herself for her tasks, the things she must supply for its achievement are pointedly specified. Starred throughout as the book is with figures, facts, personal experiences, stirring incidents, and reminiscences, to begin it is to feel its lure and to read it to the end.

America's Day. By Ignatius Phayre. Dodd, Mead & Co., New York.

This book describes America during the three years preceding 1917, when public opinion here was advancing from a condition of ignorance or indifference concerning the war to one of indignation. While the author's style is much too diffuse, while his language is sometimes extravagant and his book would gain greatly by condensation, it is worth reading, as the opinion of an Englishman who has the advantage of looking at America's share in the war from a somewhat detached standpoint.

Force Supreme (The). By Walter Wellman. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

The stake of the late war, as Mr. Wellman says, was the type of civilization the world is to have hereafter. It is not enough to have won the war. We must now work out the will of a triumphant world. That must be done by the master peoples, and it must be done by the law of association—a world organized, a world of co-operation, a world which will recognize and act upon the truth that a wrong to any member of the community is a wrong to the community. Mr. Wellman's suggestions are interesting.

Valley of Vision (The). By Henry van Dyke. Illustrated. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

Dr. van Dyke's delicate art has made out of some of his experiences in the war a volume that will attract many readers whose appetite for ordinary war stories is by this time satiated. In addition, there are here some dream stories that are quite unusual in their charm.

War Diary of a Diplomat (The). By Lee Meriwether. Dodd, Mead & Co., New York.

Mr. Meriwether is well known as a lively narrator and commentator on men and things seen. It must be about thirty years ago that his book "A Tramp Trip" told how he saw Europe on fifty cents a day. Lately he saw it in war time as a special assistant to our Ambassador in France. He had quite unusual experiences, and, as usual with him, talked with laborers and peasants, studied industry and life closely, and has amusing and odd stories to relate.

EDUCATIONAL

Modern Punctuation. By George Summey, Jr. The Oxford University Press, New York.

This is an admirable treatise, worthy to stand on the shelf with that well-known classic on the subject, Wilson's "Treatise on English Punctuation," and timely as a supplement to Wilson's somewhat obsolescent system. It is a book for critical students rather than for casual readers, and will well repay careful examination by authors and printers.

Pronunciation of Standard English in America (The). By George Philip Krapp. The Oxford University Press, New York.

"Wherever a question of choice between two pronunciations arises, there is rarely any difficulty in making a choice after the facts are once known. It is the province of a book like this to show students how they may become sure of their facts, not to make their choices for them." So says the author. The extremely interesting and judicious conclusions of his book require real study on the reader's part to make them valuable, on account of the somewhat cabalistic system of phonetic symbols used. When these are mastered, the book will prove a gold mine for orthoepists.

MISCELLANEOUS

American Year Book (The). A Record of Events and Progress, 1918. Edited by Francis G. Wickwire, B.A., B.Sc. D. Appleton & Co., New York.

Dwellers in Arcady. By Albert Bigelow Paine. Illustrated. Harper & Brothers, New York.

Here is a pleasantly written account of the reclaiming of an abandoned farm by fortunate people who found only happiness in their venture. There are touches of humor in the book, with many attractive pictures, and "Dwellers in Arcady" will be read with interest by the many people who long for a home in the "real country."

Farmer and the New Day (The). By Kenyon L. Butterfield. The Macmillan Company, New York.

Every thoughtful farmer will find information and inspiration in this book, and if our Congressmen, Senators, and public men generally would read it their eyes might be opened to the necessity for a larger programme on the part of legislators in establishing agriculture on a better basis in the productive activities of the Nation. Here are two pregnant sentences of the author's: "The war has revealed a vacant chair at the Nation's council-table—the chair of the farmer. . . . Collective action of farmers must replace the futile aims of single-handed endeavor."

Woman Question (The). By Ellen Key, G. L. Dickinson, and Others. Compiled and Edited by T. R. Smith. (The Modern Library of the World's Best Books.) Boni & Liveright, Inc., New York.

"SEVENTEEN-YEAR LOCUSTS" DUE IN 1919

BY ROBERT H. MOULTON

THE most interesting insect in the world will be seen this summer, perhaps in very large numbers, over large areas of the United States. The insect referred to is the periodical cicada, commonly misnamed the seventeen-year locust, to which some mystery has always been attached and around which many superstitions have gathered. The name seventeen-year locust is incorrect in at least two particulars: First, it is not a locust at all, that name being properly applied only to members of the grasshopper family; and, second, while it has a seventeen-year period, it also has a thirteen-year period. It has so long been called by the name of locust, however, that there is no hope of divesting it of that incorrect appellation.

The periodical cicada spends either seven or thirteen years, lacking a few weeks, in slow development underground. Then millions of individuals attain maturity almost at the same moment and emerge for protection can be employed that will save the young and tender stock from serious injury.

While the periodical cicada appears in some portion of the United States in almost every year, the 1919 swarm is expected to be one of the most numerous, as it will include the largest brood of the seventeen-year family and a small brood of the thirteen-year family. There are thirty broods in all. The year 1868 was the greatest locust year in history. In that year Brood 19, the largest of the thirteen-year broods, appeared in conjunction with Brood 10, the two combining to make an unprecedented infestation. The coincidence of the largest seventeen-year brood with a smaller thirteen-year brood this year will hardly bring about conditions approaching those of 1868.

The United States Department of Agriculture has long kept close check on all the broods of both races, and is able to say with accuracy just when and over what territory any brood will appear. The work a noisy and strenuous existence above ground, terminating in exhaustion and death after about five weeks. During that period the females lay their eggs by chiseling grooves in the small branches of trees. This results in apparently great damage to forest, orchard, and other trees, but the fear aroused is out of proportion to the real damage likely to be done. This fear appears to have existed with the savages, and has remained with their civilized successors notwithstanding the fact that the cicada has been under investigation for well over two hundred years, and the appearance of the swarms is foretold by entomologists as accurately as eclipses of the moon are foretold by astronomers.

Upon every appearance of large broods of the cicada fear is aroused that trees will be destroyed. There would seem to be some ground for such a fear. The number of the insects is so tremendous that one can hardly understand how they can deposit their eggs in the young and tender branches of the trees without killing them. Yet the fact remains that there have been outbreaks of cicadas in some sections of the United States in most of the years since this country was discovered and that no very great damage has ever been done. Very young fruit trees sometimes are killed or seriously injured, but little or no permanent injury is done to forest trees or mature trees of any kind, and measures of of classifying and locating the various broods with their periods of recurrence began a long while ago and was attended for some time with considerable confusion. It was generally believed that the period of recurrence was seventeen years, but every once in a while there would be an outbreak that failed to coincide with any possible seventeen-year period, and investigators were getting different results, with periods apparently ranging all the way from ten years to seventeen years. All this work was done on the assumption that all periodical cicadas were alike, and the records were getting decidedly snarled before the discovery that the thirteen-year family is separate and distinct from the seventeen-year family. The honor of this discovery belongs to Dr. D. L. Phares, an independent investigator of Woodville, Mississippi, who, on May 17, 1845, published an article in which he asserted the existence of a thirteen-year race. The fact was definitely accepted in 1869, the year following the greatest locust outbreak, when Dr. B. D. Walsh and Professor C. V. Riley recorded the investigations that became the basis of the accumulated knowledge of the Department of Agriculture.

The two broods due this year are Brood 10, which belongs to the seventeen-year family, and Brood 18, which belongs to the thirteen-year family. The former will appear mostly in Northern territory and the latter in Southern territory. The whole or portions of twenty States are included within this range. They are Alabama, Delaware, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Jersey, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, Vermont, Virginia, West Virginia, Wisconsin, and the District of Columbia. It is a little hard to understand, however, how the insect can play a very important engagement in some of these States without getting into neutral territory, such as the States immediately adjoining.

The seventeen-year pest has disregarded so many of the accepted ethics of warfare in the past three or four thousand years that a little thing like violating neutral territory would not be expected to give it any more concern than the ruthless shooting up of Belgium gave ex-Kaiser William and his gray-suited cicadas in human form. But it is to the credit of the cicada that he lets you know when he is coming, and gives you ample time to arrange your defenses.

Latitude does not make any material difference in the time for the emergence of the insects. This ranges from the last week in May to the first in June. About this time the woods and orchards will be resounding with the shrill drums of the insects, and the leaves of the trees where the brood is well-represented will be studded with the cast skins deposited by the industrious and noisy little workers. Trees that exude gummy substances, such as pines and cedars, are generally avoided by the cicada when it is ready to deposit its eggs. In the orchard the apple tree is the prime favorite, with the peach and pear in close order, though all the others, and even the grape vines, are pounced upon.

The putting out of young orchards this spring is to be discouraged, according to experts. Such plantings should be deferred until fall, when danger from the great cicada swarm will be past; and young trees already planted should not be pruned. Some other ameliorative measures are recommended, such as hand-picking the insects from young trees, sprays at the time of emergence, and whitewashing of trees at the beginning of the laying period, which is around July 1.

One of the superstitions connected with the periodical cicada is the notion among some people that they could identify the cry of the insect as a resemblance to the pronunciation of the name Pharaoh, the Egyptian monarch who so relentlessly persecuted the ancient Jews. Attention has also been called to the dark bars that occur on the filmy wings of the insect in the shape of the letter "W," which to many used to mean that the coming of the pests was a forerunner of war. Since, however, the coming outbreak will arrive just at the conclusion of the greatest war, some new calamity will evidently have to be suggested this time.

There have always been reports of death caused by the sting of the cicada, despite the fact that the insect has no sting and no means for infecting any one. The cicada has a bill, and what is termed an ovipositor, the organ in which the eggs are stored during the process of development. Entomologists long ago dispelled the popular fancy that there was any fight or poison in the cicada or that his mission in life was other than to cut into trees to find lodgment for the eggs necessary to keep up the line of succession of the thirteen and seventeen year tribes.

Razor blade magnified
1000 times

DON'T LET YOUR RAZOR ABUSE YOUR FACE

THE cutting edge of every razor—"ordinary" or "safety"—consists of microscopic teeth. Magnified 1000 times these teeth look like the teeth of a cross-cut saw. See illustration above.

Now, rust forms on these teeth. This makes the blade dull—makes it "pull" and hurt your face.

You don't wipe any "safety" or "ordinary" razor blade dry enough to prevent this "surface rusting." Apply 3-in-One shaving oil before and after shaving. 3-in-One positively prevents rust on any metal.

This is the way to have a perfect shave: Moisten your thumb and forefinger with a few drops of 3-in-One. Draw razor blade between them. Then if an "ordinary" razor, strop in the usual way, first putting a few drops on the strop. You'll be surprised and delighted at the keen edge that comes so quickly and shaves so perfectly.

After shaving, be sure to repeat the oiling. That will absolutely prevent any rust forming between shaves. 3-in-One makes the razor slip over the face "slick and smooth." Also prevents the soap from burning or smarting after even a close shave. 3-in-One shaving oil has a delicate, agreeable odor.

You can get 3-in-One at any good drug, hardware or general store. East of the Rocky Mountain States, 15c, 25c and 50c in bottles; also 25c Handy Oil Cans.

BY THE WAY

The German peace envoys are, it is reported, to be housed at Versailles in the charming Hôtel des Réservoirs, once the home of Mme. de Pompadour. In this same hotel, in 1871, Bismarck and von Moltke lived while negotiations for peace after the Franco-German War were being conducted. One or two members of the hotel's staff retain vivid memories of those days of humiliation for France and for themselves. Their hour of triumph has certainly arrived.

Speaking of the Franco-German War of half a century ago, a subscriber indulges in this reminiscence: "My earliest impression of the Germans was that they were heavy consumers of beer. As a ten-year-old boy I was walking one morning in 1871 in the streets of Newark, New Jersey, with my father. A man passed crying in stentorian tones, 'Extra! Emperor Napoleon Surrenders at Sedan!' My father stopped him and bought a paper. 'It is true, my boy,' he said to me. 'This is a great historic day. To-night there will be great rejoicing among the many Germans here. Their beer gardens will be full of noisy, shouting, drinking men and women.' And they were. But little did those triumphant revelers realize that some of them might live to see the day when Bismarck's work would be completely undone in their old home and their sacred beer would be banished from their adopted country! What have they or their descendants left to live for?"

The "comics" in the daily papers are frequently banal and sometimes foolish; but occasionally one has point and humor; this, for instance, from the New York "World": Jeff—"I'm against this League of Nations." Mutt—"Why? Political reasons?" "No; musical reasons." "What do you mean?" "I mean this: It took me forty-two years to learn to sing 'My Country, 'tis of Thee,' and now we'll have to learn to sing 'Our Countries, 'tis of Those'!"

Trees are to be planted in an Avenue of Victory in Brooklyn as a memorial to fallen soldiers and sailors. Each tree will bear a plate giving the name of the man in whose memory the tree is planted. The cost of the tree, eight dollars, is contributed by friends or relatives, while the city's Park Department will plant and care for the tree and provide the name plate.

He was an airman, says the London "Sphere;" one of the kind who are not loquacious about their exploits. She tried to draw him out, with this result: She: "What does it feel like to fly?" He: "Oh, rippin'." She (after a barren pause): "Good floor last night at the dance?" He: "Top-pin'." Another pause, then—She: "Tell me about Mesopotamia. What was it like?" He (with energy): "Oh, blotto!" This last bit of slang is perhaps a successor to the now obsolescent American "n. g."

The famous prison of old Paris, the Bastille, was well guarded, and few prisoners ever escaped from it. The first man who broke out, according to "The Romance of Escapes," by Tighe Hopkins, was the Abbé Count de Buquoit, an adventurer of the early part of the eighteenth century. With a small file he cut the gratings of his cell window. He constructed a ladder from the wicker casings of wine bottles, eked out with scraps of sheets. On a dark night he and two companions descended to the moat by this ladder. His companions were captured, but Buquoit evaded the sentries and made good his escape to Switzerland.

During the war the road over the Mont Cenis Pass was used even in winter by trains of motor cars. Several thousand men, it is said, were employed to keep the Pass free from snow. The travel was mainly between Turin and Modane, a distance of eighty miles. Twenty-one miles of this was steady climbing to the top of the Pass, 7,000 feet up. Many thousands of cars, it is reported, were sent from Italy to France by this route. One set of drivers was kept exclusively for the most difficult part of the road.

The Federal Trade Commission has issued an order, it is announced, providing that a moving-picture firm must not change the name of an old, used film and show it again unless it is "clearly, definitely, distinctly, and unmistakably" made known to the public that the film with the new title is an old one reissued. This to prevent deception; for probably few people care to see a film twice. Perhaps "Cabiria," "Civilization," "Joan of Arc," and a few others are exceptions to this rule.

What is the most interesting country in the world for the tourist? The question was asked recently of a traveler of wide experience. "If I could wake up to-morrow morning in any place of my choice," he answered, "it would be Egypt. The charm of the Nile scenery, the fascination of the stupendous monuments of antiquity, and the attraction of the picturesque people that one meets there, combine to make Egypt the most interesting country in the world. Besides, do you know that Cairo has more 'double stars' in Baedeker—that sign of a first-class wonder—than Florence or Venice, and, if I mistake not, even London?"

The sale at a New York book auction, remarks "The Writer," of a copy of Edgar Allan Poe's first book, "Tamerlane," printed in Boston in 1827, for $11,600—the highest price ever paid for any American book—and, at another New York auction, of the dedication copy of Milton's "Comus" for $1,425, may be encouraging to modern authors by showing them what sums their works may sell for a century or three hundred years from now.

The advantages of system and standardized methods are shown in the getting of meals as in everything else. Table d'hôte meals are much cheaper and easier to prepare than à la carte meals. Hear the "Railway Age" on the subject: "The traveler cannot get as good a meal for $2.25 under the à la carte system as he could for $1.25 with the table d'hôte. The able dining-car steward under the table d'hôte system could serve dinner to more than two complete cars full of diners without confusion, with the food well cooked and hot, table linen clean and waiters and cooks unhurried. This is not possible, apparently, under the à la carte system."

Whether the following excerpt from the Williamsville, North Dakota, "Item" is a bona fide apology, or only the work of the office humorist, it has originality:

We wish to apologize to Mrs. Orville Overholt. In our paper last week we had as a headline "Mrs. Overholt's Big Feet." The word we ought to have used is a French word, pronounced the same way, but spelled "fete." It means a celebration, and is considered a very tony word.

Murphy Univernish

The Universal Varnish

Supplied clear and in six transparent wood colors

A Varnish as impervious to hot water as glass or china.

WOODWORK around a sink ought to be the most sanitary part of the house—and is often the least so.

Univernish gives it a surface almost as hard as glass—a surface which boiling water will not injure or turn white—a surface you can scrub with hot water and soap—a surface which will not stain or offer lodgment to waste.

And how a smooth Univernish finish in kitchen, pantry or bath room does save work! Sweeping is easier. Washing floors or linoleum varnished with Univernish is hardly any work at all.

Anyone can flow on a coat of Univernish. Use it to touch up worn or scarred woodwork and floors. Univernish is as necessary as soap to modern sanitary housekeeping.

Write for the name of a merchant who sells Murphy Univernish and for our brochure "The Modern Sanitary Kitchen."

Make Bran Likable

Every child or grown-up should eat some bran every day. Systems often clog without it. Bran is Nature's laxative.

Then why serve bran food which is uninviting? Why not Pettijohn's—a luxury dish?

This dish is ever welcome. It leads to sunnier days. You will never go without it when you try it for a week.

Pettijohn's

Roller Wheat—25% Bran

A breakfast dainty whose flavor flakes hide 25 per cent of bran.

Also Pettijohn's Flour—75 per cent fine patent flour, 25 per cent bran. Use like Graham flour in any recipe. (3059)

MAN TRAINING

Mr. H. H. Gross, President of the Universal Military Training League, sends us the following verses with this statement:

"The inclosed poem may be of interest to you. I think it is mighty good stuff. General Leonard Wood thinks so." We may add that The Outlook thinks so.

Some good judges returning from Europe have said that our citizen soldiers over there are not sympathetic with a policy of universal military training because their experience has led them to distrust the militaristic and sometimes despotic character of "regular armies." The Universal Military Training League is not militaristic in any sense of the word. Its object is:

To secure the adoption of Federal legislation for universal training for preparedness. To have available in case of war a trained citizen-reserve; the training to include vocational training and instruction in civil government, and the duties of American citizenship.

It advocates the military method of training to accomplish this object just as the Boy Scouts advocate it because it is the simplest and most effective method of enabling large bodies of men to act in unison for a definite end. We believe that it is the almost unanimous opinion of the rank and file in our National Army and Navy that their life in the training camps was of immense benefit to them physically and morally. The following is the poem which Mr. Gross sends us:

TO THE MEN OF AMERICA

You talk of your breed of cattle,
And plan for a higher strain,
You double the food of the pasture,
You heap up the measure of grain;
You draw on the wits of the Nation
To better the barn and the pen;
But what are you doing, my brothers,
To better the breed of men?

You boast of your Morgans and Herefords,
Of the worth of a calf or a colt,
And scoff at the scrub and the mongrel,
As worthy a fool or a dolt;
You mention the points of your roadster
With many a "wherefore" and "when,"
But, ah, are you conning, my brothers,
The worth of the children of men?

You talk of your roan-colored filly,
Your heifer so shapely and sleek;
No place shall be filled in your stanchions
By stock that's unworthy or weak.
But what of the stock of your household?
Have they wandered beyond your ken?
Oh, what is revealed in the round-up
That brands the daughters of men?

And what of your boy? Have you measured
His needs for a growing year?

Does your mark as his sire, in his features,
Mean less than your brand on a steer?
Thoroughbred—that is your watchword
For stable and pasture and pen;
But what is your word for the homestead?
Answer, you breeders of men!

MISS ROSE TRUMBULL.

Scottsdale, Arizona.

Lieutenant Edouard Isaacs, a naval officer who was captured by the Germans and escaped from a prison camp, tells of an ingenious plan by which another prisoner got his liberty. This man had a parole permit which read, "I will not make any attempt to escape." He altered this to "I will now make an attempt to escape," boldly handed in this avowal of his scheme to get his liberty, and walked out of the camp!

THE GERMANS IN PARIS

IT is evident that Germany has made elaborate preparation for argumentative resistance now that military resistance is out of the question. The delegation housed, secluded, and protected by France in a dignified and proper manner at Versailles will in all probability have received the terms proposed by the Allies before this is read. At this writing the date set is Wednesday, May 7. The programme outlined by the correspondents indicates that the German delegates will have a fortnight in which to consider the document presented to them and to file their protests and objections. The hope is expressed in Paris that by June 1 a definite point will be reached in the negotiations. For reasons which do not seem quite clear, the German National Assembly has been transferred from Weimar to Berlin for the purpose of discussing the peace terms; probably it is considered that this course would be more impressive, and that any conclusion reached would bear greater weight if it came from the real center of German political power.

Characteristically, Germany has gone from her first extreme of offering to send mere messengers to Paris to the other extreme of building up an extensive and carefully planned body of recognized experts to represent her at Paris. An analysis of the composition of the delegation, published in the New York "Times," shows that instead of six delegates, with a staff of advisers and secretaries, Germany is represented by about forty men of standing, apart from the minor assistants. The list includes diplomatic, financial, and industrial authorities of all varieties. Thus, not only are experts in iron and coal, in agriculture, in trade, in banking, and in shipping to be found in the list; but there are also authorities in art, in literature, and even in theology, for a bishop and a theological professor are among the number. Count Brockdorff-Rantzau, who heads the delegation, is classed politically as an anti-Socialist, and is a diplomat of the old type who has always worked in sympathy with the German autocratic group, although he is called a Liberal Democrat. He has denied that he depends on acing differences of opinion among the allies; but he has certainly been one of those Germans who have shut their eyes to the knowledge of Germany's complete defeat. Dr. Maurice Egan, formerly our American Minister to Denmark, who knows Count Brockdorff-Rantzau well, says: "Rantzau is intellect personified, and it will require not mere idealism but the most scrupulous knowledge of diplomatic tactics on the part of the Allies to deal with him."

Edward David, the second in authority in the German delegation, is a Majority Socialist, has had much experience in foreign affairs, and is said to insist that any treaty of peace should be submitted to the German people for ratification by vote—evidently one of the many ways in which Germany hopes to create delay and make possible a period of bargaining over the terms. Few people believe that Germany will reject absolutely or finally the terms offered, but there is every likelihood that she will attempt to drag her opponents into argument as to the consistency of the terms with the principles with which she alleges the Allies agreed to make those terms conform.

JAPAN GETS KIAOCHAU

Within a week after President Wilson had issued his declaration denying Italy's claims it was officially announced that the Council of Three of the Peace Conference had granted Japan's claims in the Shantung Province of China.

Japan's claims are based upon her military success in capturing the German colony at Kiaochau and upon a treaty by which it is understood Great Britain and France, as well as Italy and Russia, granted her this territory which she conquered. Japan's claims are also in part alleged to be confirmed by an agreement which she secured from China in 1915.

The territory in question is naturally of great commercial value, and it has been made more valuable by its development under German control. For many years Germany longed for a foothold in this part of China, and found her opportunity when two German missionaries were killed by some Chinese. As reparation for the death of these missionaries Germany demanded in 1897 and secured from China Kiaochau Bay and the port of Tientsin, with a considerable amount of back country. She also secured commercial rights. In all this matter China was of course helpless. Consequently when the war broke out in 1914 Germany had a flourishing colony at Kiaochau and commercially controlled the Shantung Peninsula and much of the commerce of that part of China. Of course this German possession was not only an imposition upon China, but a menace to Japan. Japan was not willing to enter the war against Germany without being assured that if she cleared the Pacific, including Kiaochau, of the Germans she would be permanently relieved of the German menace; and she naturally also wished to fall heir to any commercial advantage that the Germans had secured. So before entering the war she made a secret treaty with the Allies and also a treaty with China by which she was to have title to Kiaochau if she won it.

She did win it; and she therefore claimed it before the Peace Conference. When President Wilson announced that Fiume should not go to Italy because it was a Yugoslav port, and that the treaty giving Dalmatia to Italy ought not to be observed because it was a secret treaty, it was generally understood that Japan had very little chance of winning President Wilson's assent to her claims. The same arguments used by Mr. Wilson in Italy's case were applicable to the case of Japan. There was a rumor that if the Japanese claims were not allowed Japan would follow the course of Italy and withdraw from the Conference. On the last day of April, however, the decision of the Council of Three was published that all of the former German possessions were to go to Japan, but that Japanese troops were to be withdrawn as soon as possible. It was reported that Japan had given assurances that she would turn the territory over to China.

Against this decision the Chinese have made strong protest. They regard it as a high-handed procedure by which a group of nations hands Chinese territory over to another nation without any regard to Chinese rights. When it is said that the decision is in accordance with the treaty which Japan made with Great Britain and France, and that therefore Great Britain and France have no choice in the matter, the Chinese say in reply that that was a secret treaty and ought not to be observed any more than the treaty which handed Dalmatia over to Italy. When it is said that the Chinese themselves made an agreement with Japan to turn over Kiaochau to Japan, the Chinese reply that that was an agreement secured by duress and ought not to be sustained by a conference assembled to do justice.

On the other hand, it is said in defense of the President's acquiescence in this decision that, although his sympathies were with China and that his Fourteen Points sustain China, he had to decide against China, for if he had decided the other way Japan would have with from the Conference; and with Italy out and Japan out, the League of Nations would have become nothing more than an alliance between England, France, and America, and would have faced the possibility of an opposing League or alliance consisting of Germany, Russia, Italy, and Japan. Of course such an argument can come only from those who have little faith in our allies and therefore small basis for faith in a League of Nations. It is pointed out, moreover, that whereas Italy was running a good deal of risk in withdrawing from the Conference alone, Japan would have run no such risk, for she was economically independent of the United States. So, it is said, practical considerations had to take precedence over theoretical principles.)

THE ANALOGY BETWEEN JAPAN AND ITALY

There are many facts which make the cases of Italy and Japan in the Peace Conference analogous. (Kiaochau was granted to Japan by a secret treaty; so was Dalmatia granted to Italy. Kiaochau was won by the sacrifice of Japan in the war; so was Dalmatia won by the sacrifice of Italy. The question of Kiaochau was a matter of dispute between two allies, Japan and China; so were Dalmatia and Fiume a matter of dispute between two allies, Italy and Yugoslavia. Kiaochau is a point of great importance to the military safety and commercial prosperity of Japan; while Dalmatia and Fiume are points of vital importance to the military safety and commercial prosperity of Italy. In the question of Kiaochau it has been alleged that there is involved a sort of Monroe Doctrine for Japan in the East; but there is equal ground for saying that in the case of Fiume and Dalmatia there is involved a sort of Monroe Doctrine for Italy in the Adriatic. It can be said that whatever differences there are in the analogy between the two cases are in favor of Italy. In the case of Kiaochau there is no bona-fide Japanese community involved; while in the Adriatic there are bona-fide Italian communities along the Dalmatian coast and at Fiume. There has been no report of a demand on the part of the inhabitants of Tientsin to become Japanese; while there has been issued from Fiume and from Zara (another city on the Adriatic) an announcement that the inhabitants desire to become Italian. Whatever need Japan has for the possession of Kiaochau for military defense is remote; while the military value of Dalmatia as a safeguard to Italy has been proved in this war. Whereas the dispute in the case of Kiaochau is between two nations whose loyalty to the Allies' cause is equally clear, in the case of Fiume the Italian claims are disputed by a people who in part were hostile not only to Italy but to the whole cause of the Allies.

Yet of these two analogous cases, one was decided in favor of Japan, while the other was against Italy. Why? It is said by a correspondent defending the course of President Wilson that "circumstances sufficiently different make different treatment absolutely essential. Japan is in a strong enough position economically actually to carry out her threat to withdraw from both the League of Nations and the Peace Conference if she lost everything." The implication is that Italy is not strong. Why is Italy economically weak? Why is she dependent upon the United States for the food and raw material and financial aid? She is dependent because she has been exhausted by her long, continuous war against the common enemy. The result is that Japan, unweakened by war, wins her case; while Italy, weakened by fighting America's enemy, loses.

There are certain conclusions that an impartial observer might draw from these facts: first, that a League of Nations founded on the proposition that moral authority is a complete substitute for military force begins inauspiciously by yielding to a display of material strength; second, that hereafter Japan might be excused if she concluded that what really counts in international decisions is, after all, not a just cause, but a strong military or economic position; third, that China might well understand that her allies consider helplessness not an occasion for offering aid, but as an offense to be punished; fourth, that Italy might well understand the decision as a notification that she might have had a decision like that granted in Japan's favor if she had not weakened herself by fighting so devotedly for the cause of the Allies; and, fifth, that the United States, reversing the policy of speaking softly and carrying a big stick, had done much loud talking about principles but had yielded to the big stick in others' hands.

It is not likely, in the face of the decision in the Japanese case, that President Wilson's judgment against Italy will be finally adopted. Despatches state that the Italian Prime Minister is returning to the Peace Conference, and that a compromise has been reached. There are reports that Fiume is to be temporarily internationalized till the Yugoslavs erect terminal facilities at another port, and then will become Italian. If this proves to be the final verdict, it seems as if it might have been reached without all this trouble and animosity. Can it be possible that somebody in authority had to experience this crisis in order to learn that there were other harbors besides that at Fiume available for the Yugoslavs?

LOYAL RUSSIA

Only those forces in Russia which make for law and order and against terrorism and class tyranny are loyal to the true Russia. Most powerful among these forces is the All-Russian Government at Omsk, supported in the field by the army of Kolchak, now cordially aided by Denikine. If the Allies and the United States find it wise to recognize any government in Russia, it is that at Omsk, not that at Moscow, which deserves consideration. If Russia is to be fed by the Allies, it is wrong to waste time in trying to induce Lenine to stop violence and stop war; the way to feed Russia, as has been said, is "from the edges inward, not from Moscow outward."

Recent news has recorded notable successes of the anti-Bolshevist forces. Kolchak has advanced to the Volga River and is to have headquarters at Ekaterinburg, where the Czar is believed to have been murdered. His forces now control territory from the Pacific to the Urals containing, it is said, 70,000,000 people. The Omsk Government, one correspondent writes, is aided by representatives of the co-operative societies, the professional unions, the Constitutional Democratic party, Social Revolutionists, Social Democrats, and Cossacks. It is added: "Naturally there are many shades of political opinion in this body, but its members have announced themselves as definitely in accord on two points—in their support of Kolchak and in the proclamation barring out the Bolsheviks." In another direction the Bolsheviks are being hard pressed by the Finns, who have even been reported to be on the point of capturing Petrograd. In Northern Russia the Allies continue to repulse attacks.

An appeal to the Allies to recognize the Omsk Government has just been issued by an association of Russian army and navy officers in this country. It urges that with small exceptions the anti-Bolshevist forces in Russia are working with or under Kolchak, and that he has succeeded "in suppressing the Bolshevik movement throughout Siberia, in establishing law and order in the regions controlled by him, in regenerating the national spirit among the soldiers of the young and brave Siberian army, and finally in setting up a stable Government with strong administrative branches all through Siberia and in the Seven River region."

As to the political purposes of Kolchak, who has been charged with personal ambition to become dictator, this appeal declares:

Anarchy is a brutal force; anarchy can be combated by force only; under the prevailing conditions bayonets must precede electoral campaigns. Admiral Kolchak has stated quite distinctly and on various occasions that he is going to lead the Russian people to the convocation of a National Assembly; he took an oath, and as a man of honor he will uphold it, that he would merely consider himself as a temporary ruler, and that he would lead the nation to the polls. . . . Anarchy must be crushed in order to give the people the opportunity to work out a national policy of their own and such a political status as would best fit their historical traditions and national aspirations.

It is for those who hate Bolshevism and all it implies to give their sympathy and support to every sound effort to unite the Russian people in a campaign for self-government rather than to deal with the Moscow gang as if they represented in any large or true sense the Russian people.

THE INVASION OF HUNGARY

Pressure from without as well as disension within has caused the downfall of the Communist Government in Hungary headed by Bela Kun. Indeed, in the first days in May it was reported that King Ferdinand of Rumania was about to enter Budapest, Hungary's capital. Bela Kun's rule has never been firmly established, and the Red Army raised by his followers has been far from formidable. The threat of the Russian Bolsheviks to send forces to the aid of the Reds in Hungary, which included an ultimatum to Rumania demanding the evacuation of Bessarabia, has proved to be an absurd piece of boastfulness, and the fall of the Communist Government in Hungary is the best reply to the Bolshevik braggadocio.

However much one may approve of the downfall of the Reds in Hungary, the whole warlike episode is a reproach to weakness of purpose among the Great Powers. It was their duty, during the period between the signing of the armistice and the completion of peace terms with Germany and Austria, to see that peace was kept in Central Europe. It is not necessary to pass an opinion as to the justice of the claims of Rumania and of the Czechoslovaks. It was not for those countries to decide where the line of territorial demarkation between Hungary and neighboring countries should lie. That was the duty of the Powers, and if military action was necessary as against Hungary, it should have been taken by the Powers themselves. At one time the Council of the Allies in Paris positively forbade such action as the Rumanians and Czechoslovaks have taken in attacking Hungary, but their decree, for it was in that form, received little or no attention. At all events, hostilities ceased only when the Hungarians offered territorial concessions both to Rumania and the Czechoslovaks. If Hungary is to be dismembered or diminished in territory (and the misgovernment in that country certainly makes her deserve drastic terms), the decision should come, not through little wars waged by newly formed countries, but through a serious decision reached by the Powers really responsible for the peace of the future.

The incident illustrates, as does the Allies' attitude toward the Russian situation, the fact that there have been lacking at Paris the clear decision and vigor which should have been the controlling element during this intermediate period.

THE GALLANT SEVENTY-SEVENTH

New York City last week honored and welcomed its Seventy-seventh Division no less enthusiastically than it did before the equally famous Twenty-seventh (which in its make-up was more a State and less a city division than the Seventy-seventh) or its favorite "Irish Sixty-ninth," or than New England welcomed its gallant Twenty-sixth Division the other day. If the Twenty-seventh helped break the Hindenburg line, the Seventy-seventh cleared up the Argonne Forest and played its part bravely and victoriously in the great Argonne offensive—the one big offensive carried on by an all-American army on a large scale; in it over 600,000 American soldiers were engaged and some of the many divisions employed suffered the heaviest casualties of the war.

The Seventy-seventh, made up of selective service men, was surely a melting-pot division. One newspaper writer says of its men:

Eighteen months ago they were a conglomerate mob of tailors, scions of the colonial Dutch "square heads," college men, stavedores, subway diggers, millionaires, bankers, crap-shooters, stuss-players, and gunmen. To-day, surviving veterans of some of the fiercest battles of the greatest war in history, they are returning conscious of a clean fighting record that gives strength to their claims of glory.

Among the things for which the Seventy-seventh will always be remembered is the glorious incident of Lieutenant-Colonel Whittlesey's "Lost Battalion." General Alexander, the division commander, has declared that the battalion, although cut off and surrounded by the Germans, was neither "lost" nor "rescued," but that Lieutenant-Colonel Whittlesey, having been ordered to take a certain objective, took it, and advanced more rapidly than troops on his flanks and troops behind him.

This version adds rather than detracts from the heroism of the achievement, for it shows that there was no rash, reckless advance beyond orders or against orders—a serious military fault which in more than one instance in this war resulted in tragic, purposeless loss of life.

Whatever their racial descent or social history—and every grade, high and low, was represented—these men were Americans through and through. Their valor and their patriotism were of the highest. They will take back to their homes the spirit of common American effort and sacrifice for the common safety and honor. And this influence may go far to counteract pernicious theories preached by anti-American Anarchists.

MAY DAY VIOLENCE

By a lamentable custom of agitators and "demonstrators," May Day, once devoted to outdoor rejoicing, has become the rallying-point of industrial warfare and anarchistic violence—and in some instances of anti-anarchistic but no less lawless violence.

Such rioting as took place on May 1 in Cleveland, New York, Paris, and elsewhere was not on a large scale, although lives were lost and injuries were numerous, but is deplorable because it indicates ignorant lack of faith in legitimate methods of presenting reasonable claims or political purposes. Charges of disloyalty and Bolshevism, on one side, and of brutality by police or mobs of discharged soldiers, on the other, intensify bad feeling.

The remedy in the future is in stronger and clearer laws defining or limiting the rights of public speaking and "demonstrating," and the rigid enforcement of law against any overt attempt to incite revolution or preach disloyalty. Terrorism may be advocated in Moscow, but it ought not to be conceivable in Paris or New York. Socialism is not to be brought about by street fighting, nor is it to be defeated by beating up even offensive agitators. If there are centers of objectionable agitation (as is alleged of the Rand School in New York), there must be law to deal with the pests, not angry mobs.

In line with this commonplace principle, Senator New proposes to reintroduce his bill forbidding the publishing or selling of books or papers which advise "the overthrow by force or violence or by physical injury to person or property or by general cessation of industry of the Government of the United States or of all government." Equally stringently the bill forbids the display of any flag or emblem intended "to symbolize a purpose to overthrow by force or violence or by physical injury to person or property, or by the general cessation of industry, the Government of the United States." This may or may not precisely meet the situation, but that some measures should be taken is proven by the perfectly senseless violence of last May Day.

The atrocious attempt to murder, by deadly bombs sent through the mail, men who have been prominently identified with trying Anarchists or who are assumed to be anti-radical or capitalistic in their sympathies, also suggests the need of new legislation; for it is stated that bomb manufacture is more prevalent in America than elsewhere simply because our laws are lax as to the manufacture and sale of explosives. Only the quick intelligence of a post-office employee prevented a series of horrible murders, and while clues seemed at first to be abundant, the scoundrel who planned the crime remains, as we write, undetected. Whether the criminal was an anarchistic agitator or not, he certainly was moved by hatred against the exponents of law and order. The theory of the Reds that the crime was a "frame-up" by their enemies is baseless and silly.

STREET RAILWAY FARES

Various cities throughout the country have been struggling with the question of street railway fares. The companies operating such railways have claimed that the standard fare of five cents is not sufficient to pay the wages and other costs of operation and maintenance, and bonded interest, to say nothing of dividends. In more than one instance the fares have been increased fifty per cent with the consent of municipal or other officials.

In The Outlook of April 30 Mr. Theodore H. Price published an article with a chart entitled "The Index Number Wage," which showed at a glance how the price of foodstuffs and other necessary commodities has risen during the last twenty years. At that time we said: "It is perfectly clear that the wages of employees must go up with the cost of living. It is equally a mathematical deduction that railway rates must go up also to meet this necessary rise in wages or else the railways will be bankrupt." This mathematical deduction is just as applicable to the street railways as it is to the steam railways. Either the street railways must be taken over by the various municipalities in which they run and must be operated as public utilities, the taxpayer bearing the deficits; or, if private management is desired, the private owners must receive sufficient return to warrant them in maintaining proper service.

There are a good many reasons for thinking that the public sentiment in this country favors private operation under some kind of fair governmental regulation of its steam railways. The same, we think, is true in most communities at present of street railways. The question is, What is fair regulation?

We have received a communication from a reader of The Outlook who for some years has had active experience in the organization and reorganization of street railway companies, in which he endeavors briefly to outline a plan of municipal regulation of street railways. From that communication we quote the following passage:

If the street railway is to be looked upon as a servant of the people, and that is what it must be, then in order to be an efficient servant it must be operated and run by trained men who must look to the excellence of their work for a continuance of their jobs, and the road must earn enough to pay interest on what it is worth as a going concern, pay its wages, and maintain its property. This means a business, not a political, organization.

Hostility between the street railway and the city served must cease in the interest of both.

This can be brought about by valuing the roads of to-day as going concerns—the city and the road in question each to name one firm of engineers, and these two to select a third, the city to pass such ordinances as will permit seven per cent to be earned upon the agreed upon valuation and on the new property added from time to time, through the imposition of such fares as will raise the necessary revenue; and in consideration of such action on the city's part to protect the property at its just value, any excess earnings to be divided between the corporation and the city, the city at its annual election to elect two directors, one an engineer and the other a certified accountant, to represent it on the Railway Board.

With the city then in partnership with the street railway, its records and accounts open at all times to the city through its accredited representative on the Board, the many fruitful grounds for misunderstanding will be abolished. The election of men for this specific purpose will prevent a shifting of responsibility from one city father to another, and men so elected can be held to a strict accountability. Both the railway officials and the city's officials will be only too anxious to stand well with the public, and the Public Service Commission will still exist as an umpire.

This kind of partnership between the city authorities and street railway experts is well worth consideration, and we commend it to those who are struggling with these problems.

DEMOCRATIC FACTORY MANAGEMENT

Many years ago The Outlook published a series of articles under the general title of "Industrial Democracy." It is our impression that the term "industrial democracy" was framed and first used in these columns. At all events, we employed it to express our belief that in the slow but steady process of social revolution in which man first struggled for and established religious democracy, then political democracy, then educational democracy, he is now seeking perfectly logically to obtain democracy in industry.

We have defined industrial democracy as that system in which the hand-worker or employee shall have a voice in the management of the business and a participation in the profits. It is our conviction that only in this way can an efficient partnership between so-called labor and so-called capital be established. For laborers and capitalists are not enemies nor are their interests conflicting. They are really partners.

There have recently come to our attention three or four interesting instances in which there has been an earnest attempt made by corporations to give their workers a share in the profits and a representation in the management. This is due, we think, to the changes produced by the war in the economic theories of the world. We have asked Mr. Theodore H. Price, a valued contributor to The Outlook on economic and industrial problems, to give us an article on this subject. In preparing it he desires the co-operation of our readers and asks us to print the following letter, which we gladly do:

To the Readers of The Outlook:

At the suggestion of the editors of The Outlook, I am planning to write an article upon "Profit Sharing and Democratic Factory Management." In this article I shall endeavor to include a comparative digest of the various profit-sharing plans that have been introduced in the conduct of many American industrial and commercial establishments.

That this digest may be inclusive and intelligent, I am taking this method of requesting that all those to whose eye this letter may come should send me in detail or in outline a description of any profit-sharing plan of which they may have knowledge as in actual operation.

I shall also appreciate any suggestions drawn from the experience or observation of my correspondents that will be helpful.

My address is 15 Wall Street, New York, N. Y.

THEODORE H. PRICE.

AMERICAN SOLDIERS AND FRENCH UNIVERSITIES

It has long been a dream of the writer of this paragraph—probably never to be realized, alas!—that it would be delightful to spend a winter in the old French university town of Montpellier. Montpellier lies practically on the Mediterranean near Marseilles, and is the seat of one of the oldest and perhaps it may also be said one of the most old-fashioned universities in France. It has a special place in academic history because one of the great classical scholars of the Renaissance period, Isaac Casaubon, lectured there.

What could be more pleasant for an American who hates the cold and loves the sunshine of the Mediterranean than to spend a winter at Montpellier, straightening out and polishing up his French by taking a course of lectures, extra curriculum, on, let us say, the life and work of Casaubon himself, provided some member of the faculty could be persuaded to give such a course of lectures.

All these reflections are prompted by some facts which have just been furnished to us through the courtesy of Mr. Marcel Knecht, of the Official Bureau of French Information in New York City, regarding the registration of American soldiers of the A. E. F. in French universities. Mr. André Tardieu, formerly French High Commissioner to the United States, devised a plan last autumn by which these soldiers, most of them college men whom the war seized from their studies, have been distributed among the French universities. The purpose of the plan is to give American soldiers an opportunity to spend time that is not needed for military duties in taking special courses in continuation of their academic careers. The amazing number, of 5,800 soldiers have been availing themselves of this opportunity. Fourteen universities in various towns throughout the French Republic are participating in the plan. Seventeen hundred American soldiers are registered, for example, at the Sorbonne in Paris, and eleven hundred are registered, or were on the last of March, at the University of Toulouse in southern France. The next largest number, five hundred and fifty, were at Montpellier. The balance of these American students were distributed at the Universities of Rennes, Caen, Nancy, Poitiers, Dijon, Besançon, Grenoble, Aix-Marseille, Bordeaux, Clermont-Ferrand, and Lyon. American professors who are doing special war service in France have been taken into the work and are acting in the capacity of what might perhaps be called university liaison officers. There could be no better scheme devised to develop and maintain the relations of understanding and friendship between the two Republics.

England is also opening her universities to American soldier students. An early issue of The Outlook will contain an article by Dr. Shipley, of Christ's College, Cambridge, giving some impressions of the American Army men now studying at this ancient and beautiful British seat of learning.

THE INTERCHURCH WORLD MOVEMENT

"America has moved out of its old isolation into the realm of world affairs. The programme of the Church must match the policy of the Nation if the Church is to continue as a world force."

This, in substance, is what the Interchurch World Movement, which was the subject of a great Conference held in Cleveland on April 30 to May 2, stands for.

Perhaps its spirit can best be described by certain extracts from the speech of the Chairman of the gathering, Dr. S. Earl Taylor. It was in that speech that he used the words which we quote as the characterization of the movement. He cited the remarks of General Byng, the famous commander of the Canadians at Vimy and of the British Third Army at Cambrai, when he said to Bishop McConnell: "I trust that you will go back to your own country and go to your own people, and in every way that you can urge upon them that in the days, the terrible days ahead of us, the days after the war, the Church shall fail not." And Dr. Taylor asked, "What has made democracy safe in America?" And he answered, "The Christian home, the open Bible, the free church. In a word, the foundations of intelligence and morality laid deep by our Pilgrim and Puritan forefathers."

And he went on to show by words and by pictures on the screen that invariably at the bottom of every peril that is threatening the world to-day is the lack of that foundation of morality, and to show also that the places of stability, of contentment, of peace, and of strength are places where moral principle and education, and, underneath all, religious faith, prevail. And he put before his audience facts showing that investments in schools and churches are really investments in security. "Beyond all question the Church of Christ is incomparably the most powerful organization that we know anything about in the world. And yet a fair study of its latent resources and unused power would probably compel us to conclude that of all the great organizations in the world the Church is developed to the smallest percentage of its capacity." He declared that interest charges on the cost of the World War at four per cent for one hour exceeded the total gifts from America for foreign missions for the year 1918.

The Interchurch World Movement is an attempt to bring the Protestant Churches, that is, the twenty-five million people who make up the Protestant Churches of America, into action somewhat more in proportion than at present to their power and resources. It is an effort to enable America, the only Western Nation that has not sacrificed virtually a whole generation of its youth in war, to see that the democracy which the war has saved is itself saved from becoming merely materialistic or destructive or anarchic by being made a moral, a religious, a Christian democracy.

To this end, the Conference at Cleveland assembled nearly five hundred delegates, representing twenty-eight denominations. Most of these delegates were officers or members of various missionary boards, a number of them were college presidents and professors, others represented interdenominational organizations, and others were editors and clergymen.

It was decided to make surveys to show what is being done and what is not being done in home and foreign missions, education, religious training, and social service. When the surveys are ready, then a co-operative community and world programme will be outlined and put into operation. The purpose is to have in all communities joint "drives" like those for the Liberty Loans or the Red Cross, but in this case for the common use of the Protestant churches. The first purpose is to increase the constituency of the churches—to double it. It is somewhat staggering, certainly it is a bold conception, but its boldness has won to the movement many of the strongest leaders.

There was a frank facing of the fact that in all this the Churches would have to place themselves in accord with the spirit of democracy, and especially in contact with industrial questions and with the life of people who work with their hands. A keen edge to the discussion of this aspect of the problem before the Churches was given by the fact that on Thursday, in front of the hotel occupied by the Convention, there was a Socialist demonstration and rioting. It is true that the participants in the riot were overwhelmingly foreign-born; but the red flags and the disorder and the injuries constituted a picture of what the Church has to face in the world to-day.

The official leaders of the Interchurch Movement, chosen by the general committee at this session, are: Chairman, F. W. Ayer, of New York, leader of the Baptist Layman's Movement; vice-chairman, Fred B. Smith, of New York, widely known as a Y. M. C. A. leader, and promoter of the Men and Religion Movement; recording secretary, W. B. Millar, New York, secretary Layman's Missionary Movement; executive secretary, S. Earl Taylor, New York, secretary Methodist Episcopal Board of Foreign Missions; treasurer, George M. Fowles, New York; and John R. Mott, of New York, chairman of the executive committee. These officials, with the co-operation of "key men" in the various interested denominations, will develop the plans to be perfected at a great gathering which is to be held next fall.

THE RED CROSS OF THE FUTURE

The large extension of the field of Red Cross activities, already proposed and to some extent put in operation in this country by the American Red Cross, is to be taken up on a world-wide scale and purpose by a Red Cross Congress to convene at Geneva thirty days after peace has been declared. This International Congress at Geneva will be the most momentous meeting in the history of the Red Cross movement. Already a preliminary meeting of experts on such subjects as child welfare, tuberculosis, hygiene, and all the large aspects of public health, has been in session at Cannes, with a view to prepare for the Geneva conference an extended programme of desirable new Red Cross activities in the interests of humanity.

The resolution adopted by these distinguished physicians and scientists of England, France, Japan, Italy, and the United States defines the purpose of the movement to be "to spread the light of science and the warmth of human sympathy into every corner of the world."

Heretofore the field of the Red Cross has been to alleviate the suffering caused by war or by some terrible calamity. But the efficiency of the association and the liberality with which the people answer its calls for support have made it evident that it has a wider mission than this. Hereafter, as the resolution adopted at the Cannes meeting declared, "while every measure should be taken to repair the ravages of war and to prevent all wars, it is no less important that the world should address itself to the prevention and amelioration of those ever-present tragedies of unnecessary sickness and death which occur in the homes of all peoples."

There can be no doubt that this movement will have the support of the peoples of the world in creating a vast organization, thoroughly equipped, to promote human betterment in a systematic and co-ordinated manner. The particular purposes laid down by the experts at the Cannes conference are the development of sound measures for public health and sanitation, the welfare of children and mothers, the education and training of nurses, the control of tuberculosis, venereal diseases, malaria, and other infectious and preventable diseases.

The call issued by the International Committee of the Red Cross Societies of the world rightly declares that the new programme is exactly in keeping with the high ideals which led to the formation of the Red Cross half a century ago. It is certainly true, to quote the words of the Committee, that "if it was possible half a century ago to bring nations to an understanding, not to abolish war, but to alleviate in some measure the suffering which follows in its wake, surely such an understanding would be more beneficent, even more glorious, when it leads the nations to work in concert under the impulse of mutual confidence and common charity to remedy certain ills which are visited upon the human society, or to bring aid to one of the nations stricken by sudden catastrophe."

FOR WORKING GIRLS

Twenty-eight years ago The Outlook first called the attention of its readers to the value and quality of the help rendered sick and tired girls by the Working Girls' Vacation Society of New York. Our readers responded then with liberality. From time to time since similar appeals have shown that the cause was remembered. Now a special condition encourages the hope that the pleasant co-operation of the past may be renewed.

In common with other philanthropies, the Working Girls' Vacation Society has felt seriously the financial conditions caused by the war. It is now facing a serious problem.

In addition to its regular vacation work at their houses in New York, Connecticut, and New Jersey, the Society has for twenty-five years conducted two houses at Santa Clara, in the Adirondacks, for the care of working girls who have tuberculosis in the incipient and curable state. These houses are necessarily run at special expense, as the girls must have the most nourishing food and live under the best conditions in order that they may be sufficiently benefited to return to their work at the end of the period of rest and recreation. As the nearest physician lives ten miles from the little hamlet of Santa Clara, it is necessary to have a resident doctor in case of a sudden illness. The house is not called a hospital or a sanitarium, but is simply a Vacation House where girls are sufficiently renewed in health to be able to continue work on their return to the city.

In many instances the girls must return to Santa Clara for a number of summers before the tendency to consumption is entirely conquered. It often happens that the girls who go to the examining physician in New York have no idea that they are threatened with tuberculosis. They are languid and ill, and when they are told the nature of their trouble they are naturally frightened at first, but later are very grateful that the disease has been taken in time.

The two houses in the Adirondacks—Uplands and Hillcrest—were given to the Society by Mr. George E. Dodge. They are very perfectly equipped for the work and accommodate fifty-seven girls at a time. Now, because of the increased cost of everything—food, transportation, wages—as well as a decrease in income because of the demands made by the war, the Society will be obliged to close one of these two houses this coming summer unless it can raise the $4,000 necessary for its support.

We ask those to whom this intensive effort to make working girls well and strong and give them a healthful and happy vacation appeals to write to the Secretary, Mrs. William Herbert (United Charities Building, New York), for the extremely interesting thirty-third annual report of the Working Girls' Vacation Society or to send contributions directly to the same address.

A SOUTHERN PHILANTHROPIST ON THE RACE QUESTION

We have received a pamphlet read at a meeting last March in Boston by Mr. Bolton Smith, of Memphis, Tennessee, which we wish might have a wide circulation. Coming from a man born in the North but long resident in the South, who is in sympathy with the intelligent Southern view of the race question, it presents by the principles it inculcates and the spirit it manifests a basis for a real agreement in both thought and feeling between the North and the South. The Northern and Southern positions are not antagonistic; they are not necessarily divergent. There is no incongruity between the Northern demand for justice to the Negro and the Southern demand for the preservation of the purity of the white race. We agree with Mr. Smith in his statement: "I believe these are the two sides of one and the same shield—the blood of the race must be kept pure, but so must its ideals—the former without the latter is like the body without the soul."

He urges that the children of the Negro and the white races be educated in separate schools, but he also urges that the schools be as good for the one race as for the other. He cites as an illustration the public schools in Cincinnati. There is no separate school law in Ohio, and Negro children have the right to attend the public schools attended by white children. "There is, however, a school in a densely colored portion of Cincinnati which I am informed is attended by Negro children only. It is stated that the average marks of these colored children for scholarship are higher than those earned by the colored children attending the schools also attended by white children. Besides, it is found that a larger proportion remain in school through the higher classes than is the case with the other colored children." The secret of this fact may, however, well be that "the school to which I refer in Cincinnati has just as much money spent on it as the other schools of the city."

He denies that the education of the Negro race will have any tendency to develop in that race a desire for social equality with the whites. The fact that a white man who should discover that he had Negro blood would wish to keep the secret and continue to associate with white people does not prove that a Negro who has never thought of himself as anything else would be otherwise than uncomfortable if he were called on to associate intimately with white people. Mr. Smith gives this illustration:

When told of the valor of the British and the French, Americans do not feel the poorer. Rather do we feel the richer that we live in a world in which there is so much courage. These stories of the valor of our allies do not dim in the least the luster of the deeds of our own boys.

In the same way I feel the fame of my race to be safe and that I am the richer whenever I learn of some worthy accomplishment of a Negro. It is as if the Power that brought me here had said: "If this wonderful thing of life which you share can strike a spark from even this humble breast, how much more may you not attain to!"

The author is equally insistent on justice to the Negro and in his hostility to lynching. Lynching does not stop crime, and "what we want is to prevent crime rather than to have to punish it." As one means of preventing it he would establish colonies for the feeble-minded; and as another he would make provision for young Negro children so that they could be cared for during the day and taught simple work and play and trained as useful members of society. "It would be even cheaper in the long run than spending so much on criminal court and penitentiary." Above all, he would secure justice under the law for the Negro. "Every lynching makes even the good Negro feel less safe in his person and property."

AIRPLANE AMBULANCES

We have received, through the courtesy of Dr. C. L. Gibson, of New York City, an account of the successful employment of an airplane as a war ambulance in the desert of Morocco. The account comes from Dr. Tuffier, a friend of Dr. Gibson's, who not only holds a place of eminence in French surgery, but has been Chief Consultant to the French armies. Dr. Tuffier's account is especially interesting because it is not a prophecy of what aviators dream of doing in the future, but a scientific narrative of what they have already actually accomplished.

Dr. Tuffier was called from France to Morocco to see a general who had been badly wounded by a shell fragment which had entered the left side of the chest and had become lodged behind the heart. This officer had been wounded at a place one hundred and seventy miles from any railway. He had been carried to the rear from the line of fighting, fifteen miles, on a litter. Two army surgeons were detailed to go to him by airplane. One started from Fez, one hundred and eighty miles away, and reached the wounded officer in three hours and ten minutes, after having crossed the Atlas Mountains at an altitude of about thirteen thousand feet. The other surgeon flew from another point sixty miles away and arrived at the same time. The station where the wounded general lay was far too primitive for a serious operation, being isolated in the desert, without any instruments or apparatus. The general's condition being very grave, he was brought back by bombing airplane to a hospital station, a distance of about forty miles, escorted by the two surgeons. Although the patient was in a very grave condition, an operation was performed, and all the immediate symptoms were successfully relieved.

This is not the only instance of the airplane being used for the transportation of wounded. It was found, so Dr. Tuffier reports, that men suffering from the gravest lesions, such as fractures of the thigh, could be easily transported forty miles in three-quarters of an hour, flying over the enemy lines. In September, 1918, fifteen wounded men were brought back from the front in Morocco by ordinary airplane, covering a distance of sixty miles in less than seventy minutes. Before the war came to an end the French had mapped out in southern Algeria and in Tunis actual airplane routes for the evacuation of the wounded and the transportation of surgeons. One of these routes reaches a point over three hundred miles from any railway. To transport wounded men over this route by camel or mule would require twenty-six days. French pilots have made this trip in airplanes comfortably in one day. The advantages of airplane evacuation of the wounded, says Dr. Tuffier, are not only the rapidity but the possibility of penetrating to stations which are for the most part surrounded by the enemy.

He prophesies that special airplane ambulances will be built with proper accommodations and entrances for the wounded, especially for grave cases of injury to the head, chest, and abdomen. We suppose that the great extent of level area in the desert would make landing, forced or voluntary, more simple than in an ordinary hilly and mountainous country. Dr. Tuffier points out one obstacle to aviation in the Sahara Desert—that is the temperature, with the resulting atmospheric disturbances, which make it necessary for the pilot to keep five or six thousand feet in the air in the summer. The greatest drawback is the sirocco, that dry, hot wind of the desert which raises clouds of dust and makes landing so dangerous that flying is impossible about one day out of every four in the hot periods. Notwithstanding these drawbacks this airplane ambulance service is an accomplished fact.

CHINA AND JAPAN AT THE PEACE TABLE

OF all the complex problems which are being dealt with at Paris few are as delicate or important as those which concern the east coast of Asia. All the world knows of the complaints of China against Japan and her demands that Tsingtao be returned to her. All the world knows also of Japan's claims to the disputed territory and her protest against any impairment of formal treaty rights.

The sympathy of Americans, in so far as it finds expression through the press, seems to be preponderantly with China. The deep-seated suspicion of Japan which has developed in the past twelve or thirteen years has prejudiced many Americans against her, and has led them to believe that Japan is never to be trusted, least of all when she is dealing with China. Americans in China are overwhelmingly and bitterly anti-Japanese. Business men there see in Nipponese activities the closing of the open door and the stifling of legitimate competition; missionaries there have been antagonized by the Japanese exploitation of the great inchoate republic, notably in such unfortunate ways as the illicit morphine and opium traffic. Only occasionally is a voice raised publicly in defense of the island Empire. Americans have, too, a traditional sympathy with the under dog which at times approaches the quixotic, and China's helplessness and almost pathetic trust in the good intentions of the United States have been both touching and flattering.

Suspicious of Japanese activities in China are, moreover, not without some foundation. Japan holds Manchuria more tightly in her grip than in 1914. And now, since expelling the Germans, Japan has hastened to establish herself as firmly as possible in Tsingtao. If the Japanese succeed in retaining their present hold, the province and peninsula of Shantung, to which the port of Tsingtao, together with Kiaochau, is the key, may be as firmly gripped as Manchuria. With these two sections in their hands the Japanese would have North China at their mercy; and in view of their claims in Fukien and their expanding influence in the Yangtze Valley, the Japanese would seem to be moving toward dominance in the south. To peoples who have been passing through an inferno of struggle in resisting German aggression it is natural that Japanese policies in China should seem dangerous to the peace of the world and contrary to ideas of justice and liberty. The fact that the Chinese have borrowed recklessly of Japan during the past year or two, and have pledged as security important taxes and mining, railway, and timber rights, and thus have to some extent placed themselves under Japanese control, does not make it any the less necessary to the future peace of the world that China should have a chance to work out her own salvation and that the Chinese liberals should be given all possible aid in making China a progressive and peaceful democracy.

Japan, however, should not be lightly condemned nor should her legitimate claims to industrial and commercial expansion be ignored. The situation which confronts her is not an enviable one. A rapidly growing population on islands where arable lands are limited, coal deposits are poor, and iron ore is almost non-existent presents a problem which may well give sober statesmen sleepless nights. Add to this the prejudice which closes against this people most of the unoccupied sections of the world and which is jealous of the one remaining open door—that to the neighboring continent—and the nation's plight becomes little short of desperate. The very life of Japan depends upon her ability to maintain free access to the raw materials and markets of China and the east of Asia. Her future is linked up inseparably with that of her huge neighbor, and it is simply common justice to see that no artificial obstacles shall be erected between her and the mainland.

There are, however, two ways in which Japan's interests on the continent can be secured: political domination and peaceful commercial penetration. The first of these would lead her to continue in the road which she is now traveling. It would aim at a more or less complete control of Chinese finances, both public and private, exclusive concessions for the building of railways, the development of mines, and the erection of factories. It would be accompanied by preferential tariff rates, the control of the customs service, the predominance of Japanese "advisers," the mastery of important industrial and commercial concerns, and the direction of the army and navy. This programme is that of many Japanese, for they learned their diplomacy from the predatory policies of certain European governments in the last half of the nineteenth century. Japan's ancient feudal system prepared her for bureaucratic militarism. Japan's military class can count on the support of a large body of unintelligent but intensely chauvinistic public opinion.

This policy of ruthless domination would, however, mean sorrow for China, turmoil for the world, and ultimate disaster for Japan. It would stamp out the fine beginnings of democratic life which are even now apparent in the new Republic, and by example and necessity would force upon her a military organization. The Western world would scarcely be content to stand by and watch the absorption and exclusive exploitation of a fourth of the human race. Japan would in time have to face the bitter animosity of the Chinese and the armed opposition of much of Christendom. In that case, her one hope of avoiding utter defeat and permanent ruin would be dissensions among Occidental Powers.

Japan's other hope of growth is the peaceful commercial penetration of eastern Asia. In this she has many natural advantages. Geographical proximity and kinship in culture give her an opportunity which far surpasses that of Occidental nations. Could she be sure that China would be friendly, that China would have a stable government, an expanding industry, and would be free from Western domination, she could also be sure of the lion's share of the commerce of that country and of business relations which would redound to the benefit of both peoples. This would be the ideal, for it would be based upon friendship and geographical proximity, and would release Japan from the crushing load of a big army and navy. This is the course which many of her statesmen have avowed a desire to pursue. It probably represents in the main the programme of the soberer and more peaceful elements of the nation, and it is certainly the road which the nation must follow if it is to avoid the fate of Germany.

If, however, this, and not the road of force, is to be traveled, a number of things must be done, some of them by Japan, some by China, and some by the rest of the world.

In the first place, the Japanese must win the confidence and friendship of the Chinese. That they have not succeeded in doing. They have so far been confronted by the almost unanimous distrust and hate of their neighbors—an attitude which augurs ill for the future. Some sort of radical change must be wrought in Japan's foreign policy, one which will carry much further the attitude of conciliation represented in the withdrawal of the fifth group of demands in 1915. A necessary preliminary step would seem to be the voluntary return of Tsingtao to China, the cancellation of part or all of the concessions wrung from her in 1915, the strict repression of Japanese purveyors of morphine and all other predatory traders, and a hearty willingness to co-operate with the Powers in any joint attempt to rehabilitate China.

In the second place, China must establish as soon as possible a stable government which will insure her ability to maintain her independence against foreign aggression and her steady industrial and commercial progress. This many of her younger and abler leaders seem inclined to do, and if given time and wise assistance they will probably succeed.

In the third place, the Powers must as rapidly as possible give up their spheres of influence and their special territorial, financial, and railway concessions. They must substitute for rivalry international co-operation and assistance to China until the progressive and more stable elements of that nation can get on their feet. With the enforced withdrawal of Germany and the collapse of Russia, this ought not to be the impossible task that it seemed six years ago. The proposal, made in several quarters, for an international financial group to provide and supervise the administration of such loans as China needs would seem to be very timely. This would simply be an expansion of the Knox idea of internationalizing the Manchurian railways and of the five-Power syndicate of 1912. Such an international body could supply China with what funds she needs, prevent special sinister interests and spheres of influence from developing, and provide the supervision and pressure which may be necessary to assist the better elements of the great Republic. The plan could not be realized without some friction, and it would necessitate the faithful adherence by the Powers to a self-denying ordinance. It would, moreover, be extremely distasteful to many patriotic Chinese, but it would be better than continued anarchy and possible partition.

In the achievement of such a constructive programme the United States must take a large part. She is the best source of the capital which China needs, and she has the confidence of the Chinese and a record for unselfish dealing which is, with a few exceptions, enviable. She has stood sponsor for the open-door policy and for most of the proposals for insuring China the opportunity to work out her own salvation. Through schools, churches, and hospitals American missionaries are helping to prepare leaders and pave the way for a more wholesome democratic national life.

If we are to play the part to which our past history and our present opportunities call us, however, we must be careful that there is no ground justly to suspect us of desiring what we profess the wish to keep others from doing. We must be sure that we ask for no special concessions in China and that special interests do not lead us to become simply another of the groups that are jockeying for advantage. Our merchants and investors have the right to some sort of assistance, but it should be only that which is directed to assuring for all Powers the advantages which we seek for ourselves. We must, finally, be patient and forbearing in our relations with Japan. We must appreciate to the full the situation in which that plucky nation finds herself, and, while we should countenance no acts of aggression, we must seek to understand her, to be free from the faults of which we accuse her, and by firmness, moderation, courtesy, and fair dealing help to insure conditions which will make possible the victory of her moderates and liberals.

A FRIEND OF THE BOYS

ABOUT a year ago The Outlook published three true stories of boy life, written, as we said at the time, by "a man who really cares," one who "knows the boy mind, the boy heart, and the boy language." This man was Arthur D. Chandler, whose death took place on April 19 last. The stories were the outcome of a friendly, unconventional effort to help boys to shake off the effect of wrong surroundings and the lack of an opportunity to live a wholesome, normal life. The idea was exactly in line with Arthur Chandler's character and personality. He combined the practical and the ideal in all he did and said. There was no particle of cant in him, no trace of the professional reformer. As a young man, he was an athlete, he always loved outdoors and outdoor sport, he talked unstilted, plain English with a dash of slang, he instinctively knew how boys felt and how they could be approached. When as a result of local school board work he became a trustee of the Jamesburg Home for Boys, an opportunity opened to him to humanize the relations between the officials and the boys. Like Judge Lindsey in Denver he found that the way to improve delinquent boys was to trust them. One who knew what he accomplished says rightly that this was "work requiring great delicacy in handling, keen insight, common sense, and human sympathy."

Mr. Chandler soon became impressed with the belief that between the period of detention and the return of the boy to ordinary life there should be a "clearing-house" for boys who were in danger because they had no homes. His farm for boys at Allaire, in New Jersey, was the outcome of this thought. The stories published under the head "Boy Culture and Agriculture" showed convincingly how easily and thoroughly the boys responded to the effort. In a letter about Arthur Chandler written by Mr. C. G. Kidder to the New York "Evening Post" since his death Mr. Kidder says: "Only the other day two of these lads just released from military service, homeless, made straight for the 'farm.' Arriving, they found the master absent, in his last illness, and the farm closed. The boys sat down upon a fence-rail and cried."

Arthur Chandler had a long and useful business career; as advertising and business manager of The Outlook twenty-five years ago, in an important position with Harper & Brothers for many years, and in other work with periodicals and publishing houses he built up a high reputation for efficiency and integrity. But we venture to say that he took more pleasure in his attempt "to make rightness tempting and interesting" to boys, as he phrased it, and more pride in seeing them become, one after another, "self-respecting, self-supporting, useful men and good citizens instead of dangerous crooks," than in anything else he did in his active and energetic career.

AMERICA'S FOREIGN TRADE

A MEMBER of the staff of The Outlook in Paris not many weeks ago encountered by chance in a restaurant a fellow-American, a business man, representing manufacturers of farm machinery. This is the story told to this casual acquaintance. Like many other Americans engaged in commerce, the American business man was something of an idealist. He felt that it was America's duty to help put France upon her feet. He saw that France had been fighting America's battles for months before America took her own part, and now that the war had been won, leaving France terribly shattered and America more vigorous than ever, there was a moral obligation on the part of American business men to see France resuscitated. For his part, he wanted to see what he could do to start up French agriculture. There is a great deal of American farm machinery in France; a great deal of it is useless because parts are missing or broken. So this man undertook to bring over to France these missing parts so that the farmers could use their machinery again to start making crops. The money in it for his concern was very little. Indeed, there was no intention to make any profit on the transaction. But when this man undertook to bring these missing parts into France he encountered obstacles. He could not get an import permit. The reason given was twofold: first, the French Government was looking to the rehabilitation of French industry as well as French agriculture, and therefore wanted agricultural machinery to be made in France; second, the French Government wanted to prevent any further increase of the so-called balance of trade against her, and therefore wished to discourage imports until France could get ready to export goods in exchange.

In that incident are involved some of the most vital factors in the problem of America's foreign trade following the war. There is that factor of American idealism which is quite as powerful an incentive as desire for profit. There is, too, the factor of French thrift, which is not purely French by any means, and which at times is penny wise, pound foolish. There is the factor of a world finance that is out of balance. There is the factor of America's economic strength as at once a resource from which other countries can draw, and a danger to the economic independence of those same countries. And there is, finally, the ever-present and unfailing factor of the human element.

The presence of these varying factors makes the problem of America's foreign trade at this time peculiarly difficult and complex; at the same time the war has made that problem one which concerns every part of America. For this reason, two great conventions, one largely, the other wholly, devoted to this problem, recently held in the Middle West, both representing interests Nation-wide in extent, are of special significance. One of these was the sixth National Foreign Trade Convention, held in Chicago April 24-26; the other was the seventh Annual Meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, held in St. Louis April 28 to May 1.

The Chamber of Commerce of the United States comprises in its membership more than a thousand Chambers of Commerce and trade organizations; while the Foreign Trade Convention gathered together two thousand delegates, consisting of corporation officers, managers, experts on foreign trade, bankers, and other representatives of the great industrial and commercial concerns engaged or interested in foreign trade.

The emphasis which Mr. George Ed. Smith, President of the American Manufacturers' Export Association and Chairman of the Foreign Trade sessions at the St. Louis Convention, laid upon the opportunity before American industries to heal the economic ravages of the war was characteristic of the attitude of the men considering these foreign trade problems at both Conventions. And not less characteristic was the willingness of these men to see that American industrial expansion through foreign trade must be directed consciously with a view, not merely to the interests of America, but also to the interests of other countries. "At this particular moment in world affairs," said Mr. Smith, "with the nations of the world endeavoring to repair the ravages of war and with the old landmarks of international commerce tottering, it would be the height of folly for us to develop our foreign trade without regard to the necessities of other countries. . . . We have a responsibility, not only to Europe, but to the whole world. . . . The fact that the proper discharge of this responsibility is also good business does not alter the responsibility in any respect." Similarly, the report of the General Convention Committee of the National Foreign Trade Council which called the meeting at Chicago included this statement: "The United States has become a creditor instead of a debtor Nation. Nations which are our debtors . . . will endeavor to curtail their purchases of finished products from us and to enlarge their sales to us. They must meet their obligations by finding a market for their products. At the same time their competition with us in neutral markets naturally will be extended. The restrictions now imposed on American imports into the markets of our European associates in the war seriously impede the free flow of our commerce; but in so far as they are the outgrowth of a policy of safeguarding home industry and conservation of financial resources depleted by the heavy load of war liabilities, adverse criticism would seem unwarranted so long as such restrictions are not discriminatory."

It is a good augury for the future of our foreign trade that at the very time when America is in the position of the greatest strength, and when her opportunity for service to commerce has become enormously enlarged, the men who are in position of responsibility in business and commerce and finance in this country, and by their joint action are capable of determining our foreign trade policy, should be guided by the spirit expressed in the words we have quoted.

It is something more than mere sentiment, and very far from sentimentalism, that enables the practical American men of affairs to think of our foreign trade in terms of service. It is the highest kind of wisdom. The men who conceived of business as an orderly form of highway robbery, in which every man who made a profit got it at the expense of somebody else, are no longer in positions of influence, for the simple reason that the ideas which they held would ruin any country in these days as they have ruined Germany. That the only good bargain is a bargain that is good for both sides is a principle that has got to be recognized in our foreign trade. That nation will not only serve the world best, but secure its own prosperity most certainly, which in its policy considers, not merely its own interests, but the interests of other nations. Fortunately, our business men, and especially the men engaged in foreign trade, have had and are continuing to have especially intensive training in the art of considering the interests of other nations. What the United States has done for the maintenance of the world's food supply is of itself an object lesson in that direction. And now, in the period of reconstruction, we should have to see, even if we were not willing to see, in the industrial unrest of Russia and Hungary and Germany and other parts of the world the danger that threatens our own land if we do not consider the interests of other nations.

In view of these facts and of the necessary exercise of self-restraint and self-denial in the midst of expansion, American ingenuity will be subjected to new tests. As the report of the Convention Committee of the Foreign Trade Council said, "These conditions and the keener competition in other markets must stimulate American enterprise to new activity and determination to find compensating outlets." It is to the study of this task that the sessions of the Foreign Trade Convention were mainly devoted, and its recommendations are worth recounting. That Convention, under the chairmanship of Mr. James A. Farrell, President of the United States Steel Corporation, urged the earliest possible completion of the Government's shipbuilding plan, the removal of restrictions on shipbuilding, and permission for the free construction of vessels for sale to foreign interests; the necessary revision of shipping, navigation, and other laws to equalize with competitors the cost of operating American vessels in foreign trade; the speedy transfer of the operation of American shipping from the Government to private concerns; the establishment of coal and fuel oil depots on foreign trading routes to make

American shipping independent of foreign-owned facilities; in short, as to shipping, "American-built ships for American foreign trade;" the development of American facilities for telegraphic communication to foreign countries; the development of commercial aeronautics; the building of public airdromes to provide for the speedy delivery of plans, specifications, blue prints, and invoices from seaports to interior; the establishment of free zones at the principal American ports where products can be assembled, manufactured, and reshipped; the enactment of a bargaining tariff without waiting for a general revision of the tariff law; the extension of international parcel post; the proper representation of the United States in its diplomatic and consular services, and the proper compensation and housing of its representatives abroad; the expansion of the commercial, attaché, and trade commissioner service; the same measure of governmental protection to legitimate American investments abroad as is given by our Government to foreign investments in the United States; the establishment of railway freight rates to the seaboard for export lower than domestic rates.

Every consideration should lead America to foster the development of American foreign trade. The welfare of the American people, the resuscitation of countries suffering from the results of their own agonized resistance to German aggression, the reconstruction of international relationships, and the just demand of labor for a more equitable distribution of the necessities and comforts of life, will all be served by the proper and wise expansion of American foreign trade. There is not an American who should be indifferent to it, and there is not an American who cannot in some measure help to promote it, and to see that the spirit which the leaders of American foreign trade have shown permeates the whole body of American opinion.

WHEN THE COLORS CAME DOWN

A BUGLE call sounded over the deserted parade and the little group about the flagstaff came to attention. The hour had arrived for the closing of the camp. For weeks the gangs of workmen had been busy with the task of wrecking the barracks. For an equal number of weeks the diminished garrison had been equally busy counting and packing and shipping equipment, sorting and filing and shipping records. Now the work was at an end and the hour for departure had come. The adjutant read the order of the day officially closing the camp. The C. O. made a brief speech thanking officers and men for the devotion they had shown during the long weeks of demobilization and wishing them good luck and God-speed. Then another bugle, and the colors began slowly to flutter down. There was no band this time to play the National anthem, as in the days ago; only one lone bugler to sound "Retreat." The Y man caught his breath, however, just as he had always done, as he watched that wind-torn bunting fall. "Retreat" had ever been for him the great hour of the camp day, and, no matter how busy he had been, he had always tried to plan to be where he could see that mystical, beautiful ceremony—the khaki-clad lads standing like brown statues at salute wherever they happened to be, the wind catching at the flag as it fell, the slow, reverential way in which the color-guard received and folded it as it reached the ground, and all the time the ringing music of the old anthem that none of us knew before the war and didn't think it worth while to know. As the flag drew near the ground the band always seemed to him to put more spirit, more bold daring into the last lines:

"And the Star-Spangled Banner in triumph shall wave O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave."

And the lines had come as the months passed to be for him the voice of the heart of that America that was ready to dare all things to make them true. And this day as he watched "Retreat" for the last time he felt sure that, in spite of all its "war-weariness," America had not forgotten those great hours and would yet lead the world toward the realization of its dream.

It does not take a flag long to fall. But thoughts are swifter than falling bunting. And thoughts came thronging swiftly in those brief moments, thoughts and memories. Memories of the stirring days when those first companies came to the raw new camp, and when as raw and unfinished as the camp were the men who crowded it. College men most of them, eager for the quick service they had been promised in the driving of their "flivver" ambulances right up to the front and back again. They had had their service, and we had not been ashamed of them. If decorations count as proofs and tokens, they had probably won more glory than any other equal body of American soldiers. Their daring—so they say who know—astonished even those poilus with whom daring had often become the last and most effective weapon. There, under an unaccustomed sun, they had fought as eagerly as here they had trained and played, and many, too many, had given

"their merry life away
For country and for God."

Those colors that were falling now had received their salute, had stirred their hearts to unvoiced enthusiasms, had been the sign and token of that Cause that challenged them, that sent them forth on that long road that led to glory. The wind caught the flag as it fell and held it out for the last time against the cold April sky, as though it did not want to see it go. Perhaps the wind was thinking of those days when it had cooled their faces after the long drills, of those midnights when they marched past this place for the last time, heads up and shoulders back, with their full packs upon them, and out of the big gate and away. Truly the camp had done its part in "the big job." It had had its day.

But these men who stood now at attention, who had never marched away, did they not have a share in that glory? They had not stayed here because they wanted so to do. But their staying had made possible the things those others who had gone had done. It called for courage to drive an ambulance under the guns. But it also called for courage to stay where your orders put you on a humdrum garrison task while fools prattled about shell-proof jobs and lovely ladies grew scornful. Some time, the Y man felt sure as he looked for the last time on those serious faces, when America had grown less hectic, more capable of dispassioned sight, it will weave laurel crowns for these without filching one leaf from the brows of those who went across.

The colors have reached the ground at last. Again the bugle sounds. This time it is "Taps," not for a dead soldier, but for a dead camp. And when the last echo dies away there is a sharp word of command and we too go out of the big gate.

THE BREAK-UP OF AUSTRIA-HUNGARY

BY GREGORY MASON

STAFF CORRESPONDENT OF THE OUTLOOK

"YOU are an American, aren't you? Well, pass right through, then. No, we do not want to look at your baggage—you are an American."

This was from an Italian officer in charge of the station at Loitsch, on the frontier between Italy and the new Yugoslav state. It is the same all through Europe. "I am an American" is an open sesame everywhere, often rendering a passport superfluous.

There was an American sailor with me from one of Mr. Hoover's freight steamers which had brought a load of food to Trieste for the Czechoslovaks. He was heading for a little town in Hungary where he had a Hungarian grandmother whom he had never seen. His only paper of credentials was shore leave from the skipper of his ship. But even that was unnecessary. In his American uniform he could have walked through Europe and been sure of finding everywhere a welcome and the best hospitality the inhabitants could offer.

Involuntarily I stayed a day at Loitsch, which the Italians call Longatico. An Italian officer who courteously offered me his bed for the four-hour wait before the departure of my train himself fell asleep when that time came, and so I missed the train. But Longatico was worth seeing. The Italians claim the right to annex it, although it is overwhelmingly Slovenic in population. All the signs on all the stores are in Slovene, which looks a good deal like Russian spelled with the Roman alphabet. Many common words are the same in both languages, as narod (people) and vhod (entrance). I fell in with a Czechoslovak courier, and found that the few Russian words I remembered were understood by him as well as by the inhabitants of Loitsch. Indeed, the Yugoslavs and the Czechoslovaks have little difficulty in understanding one another.

The Slovenes seem to be easy-going people, comfortable, and not troubled by much imagination. Most of them are farmers. They are inclined to be stockily built, and all have fine complexions. Their country looks a good deal like the more rural parts of Connecticut—rolling pasture land sprinkled with rocks and a good deal of small timber. And the Slovenes themselves in appearance and temperament suggest the Swedes who have settled in such parts of Connecticut.

They are an extremely patient people. I saw a farmer who was driving a yoke of oxen wait for half an hour at a railway crossing while a little switching engine shunted cars up and down. He never lost his patience; his oxen chewed their cud and he chewed his. The adoration of all things American is as high among the Slovenes as anywhere in Europe. The new Yugoslav state, which is composed of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, has taken for its colors red, white, and blue. A photograph of President Wilson was in every other shop window, and supposedly American drinks and forms of nourishment are eagerly advertised even by the little hotels in such rustic towns as this one.

The Slovenes are good farmers, and they seem to be comparatively well off for food. At Loitsch for breakfast I got two boiled eggs, two cups of coffee, and plenty of bread and white butter, for five crowns (the crown is worth less than a quarter of its pre-war value, which was about 20 cents). For lunch I got a good thick soup, roast pork, potatoes, sauerkraut, red beans, preserved berries, and real coffee, for nineteen crowns. Of course these prices are high compared to the pre-war standard, but they are cheap compared to prices in Austria or in Germany.

The Czechoslovak courier was on the way to Vienna with a train-load of Austrian seamen, naval officers, and their wives and children from Pola, and he offered me a lift. These people and all their household effects were packed into freight cars of the small European type. In some cars there were as many as twenty men, women, and children, in addition to a great deal of baggage in the shape of boxes and barrels. One of this party was an admiral and a naval architect, who had been building ships for Austria for thirty-five years. In fact, he claimed to be the first naval architect Austria ever had. The Czechoslovak courier had also been an Austrian naval architect, with the rank of captain. A few weeks before he had been taking orders from the admiral as the latter's subordinate and countryman. Now he was an official of one of the triumphant Allied nations and the admiral was traveling in a freight car like a hobo, a mere refugee in the other's protection. But the two were good friends.

I was stepping aboard this train when a voice said, peremptorily, "Where are you from—New York, Chicago, San Francisco, or Bridgeport?"

The voice belonged to a rather disreputable-looking Italian private. He had lived in America, which accounted for his blunt method of accosting me. Four or five other privates came along who had also lived in America, and they exhibited the same delightful directness of conversational manner.

"Where are you going?" "What is your business?" "Been long away from the States?" and such questions they fired at me. In the khaki camouflage of a war correspondent, to their indiscriminating eyes, I was an officer, but their manner toward their own officers was almost equally blunt and devoid of the polite deference shown by the ordinary run of Italian soldiers. America, how great is thy democracy! Once tasted, it is never forgotten.

These men wanted to know what I thought about the League of Nations. Every one about this station or on this train seemed to be talking about the League of Nations, and particularly about its bearing on boundary questions affecting the Austrians, Yugoslavs, and Italians. The Yugoslavs and the Austrians all seem to be believers in the League, but a few of the Italians were skeptics. They were hotly attacked by a man who held quite a high position in the administration of the Italian railways. This man was born in Trieste of Slavic parents, but he refused to admit his Slav blood, calling himself "a Triestina." The Italians who were not born in Trieste noticeably make a point of declaring that they are not "Triestinas" if you ask them about their lineage.

The hills began rolling into bigger hills after we left Loitsch. When we reached the first town in Jugoslavia, we found the station decorated with evergreens and the red, white, and blue flags of the new nations. Promptly the Yugoslavs with us decorated our train with the same color scheme. The country was getting better and better, the mountains growing and the valleys widening. Later, however, the mountains fell back and we rolled down a broad plain into Laibach, a big city populated mainly by Slovenes. Yugoslav officers filled the town, in uniforms like the Serbian. There is a distinct Oriental touch about Laibach—as much of it as there is about some towns in western Russia. There was enough food in the town apparently, but nothing to spare. As my journey progressed to the northeast food was becoming scarcer and scarcer. I got a dinner of calves' brains, spinach, rice, apple sauce, two slices of bread, and a glass of beer for twenty-three crowns. According to the pre-war value of the crown, that would mean about four dollars and a half, but at the price at which I had purchased crowns it meant little more than a dollar. Austrian money is in use in Jugoslavia, but it is not accepted unless it has been stamped by the Yugoslav Government. On the other hand, money which has been so stamped will not pass in Austria.

I got aboard the train for Vienna about midnight, sharing a compartment with a Yugoslav officer. He began at length to tell me why he admired America above all other countries; "so rich, so generous, so unselfish, so brave, especially so honest!"

That is it—"especially so honest." It is finding that feeling about America all through Europe which makes an American tremble lest his country cannot live up to the almost superhuman reputation that she has now among these people. And it is finding this feeling, that we are "so generous, so unselfish," that must make an American living abroad gnash his teeth when he reads of the efforts a backward-looking little group of Senators are making to have us live aloof, for ourselves alone. But "especially so honest." That is the fact which President Wilson called, in Boston, "the most wonderful fact in history"—that "there is no nation in Europe that suspects the motive of the United States." (And, thanks mainly to President Wilson for that fact, say I, if I may be permitted this personal digression as an American who has lived all over the world except in America during the past two years, and who is disgusted with the petty criticism of President Wilson at home at a time when he is acclaimed throughout the rest of the world as the greatest statesman of this age.)

The Yugoslav captain wound up his laudation of my country with the remark that "America has become very great because she won the war."

"Every one out of the train with his baggage for inspection," shouted a train official in German, sticking his head into our compartment. The Yugoslav officer went out with his musette. I did not move. The official came back again and shouted at me, "Every one must get out for the customs examination."

I looked at him severely and said, attempting a tone like a judge pronouncing sentence:

"I am an American."

"Oh, all right," answered the official in a softer voice. "Stay right where you are, sir. Your baggage is exempt from examination."

He lingered to converse with me. "I have a brother who is living in Chicago," said he. "He says Chicago is greater as Berlin or Vienna. Your country is very rich. We hope you will send us bread. Your President is a wonderful man. He is bigger as any European statesman. I worked in London once. I learned English there. The English are fine people. Germany was crazy to risk a war with England and America. My brother voted against Wilson at the last election. He must have been a fool."

I fell asleep and dreamed a silly dream. I dreamed I saw Uncle Sam sitting on a mountain of white bread shaped like Fujiyama (not a comfortable seat). Around the base of the mountain were people of all the nationalities in Europe. Some were begging Uncle Sam to throw down boulders of bread, others were surreptitiously hacking at the foot of the mountain with pickaxes and bread-knives. When I awoke, it was nine o'clock. The Yugoslav had gone, and there were four women in the compartment. There was something harsh in their voices and features, something dowdy in their appearance, often characteristic of Teutonic women. One of them, as soon as she saw I was awake, addressed me thus:

"Excuse me sir, but I see you are an American. When is America going to send us food? Our people are dying by the thousand. And are you going to let these Yugoslavs steal land from us as they please? We have always thought you Americans were a just people, but it is not justice to let these Yugoslavs and Czechoslovaks trample on us now that we are down."

"You had your turn trampling on them, didn't you?"

"That is not so. Of course our old Imperial Government made some mistakes, but we Austrian people had nothing to do with that."

"You didn't do much to stop it, or to stop your old Government from bullying any small nation it chose to bully."

"We didn't want to bully any one. But if all Americans think like you, I'm afraid there will be another war."

"Haven't you had enough war?"

"Oh, I don't mean a war against America. We have nothing against America. I mean a war against these horrible Yugoslavs. If you let them take our land, land in which our Austrian and German people are living, we will fight them to the last man—yes, to the last woman."

O America, must you referee all the world's squabbles? The world seems to expect that; and if your decisions be not made with the wisdom of Solomon, this great popularity you have to-day will fade like the color in autumn leaves.

The feeling between the Yugoslavs and the Austrians is very bitter on both sides. With their six million Serbs, five million Croats, and one and a half million Slovenes, the Yugoslavs now outnumber the German Austrians. Of the latter there are only about ten million in all, and the Austrians say that only about six and a half million of these will be within autonomous Austria if the present boundaries of Czechoslovakia and Jugoslavia are allowed to stand. To the Austrians the loss of their trade with the Yugoslavs is hard to bear.

"What will be the future of Vienna?" I wondered, as our train ran down the plain toward the Danube, where the snow was going, and where the melting of agriculture into industry showed that we were approaching a great city.

Vienna has had its day. Any Austrian will tell you that. A city of more than two million inhabitants it cannot hope to remain. As the capital of the German Austrians alone it would deserve no more than about half a million residents. The Austrians are trying to preserve as much of its former glory as they can by urging that it be made the second capital in the new nation to be composed of all the Teutons. But as the second capital of the Teutons on their eastern frontier it can never hope for the splendor it knew as the center of the vast Austro-Hungarian Empire. Vienna is doomed. Who will regret that except the Viennese? Even if he admires its spacious public buildings—of a style of architecture too heavy to appeal to the discriminating—any man of imagination must remember that they were built by the sweat and blood of the subject races cringing under the iron heel of the villainous old aristocrats who ruled Austria-Hungary.

Vienna to-day is dirty and depressing. Dirt and newspapers are blown through the streets by gusty winds which swirl germs into the faces of the inhabitants, most of whose constitutions are now too weak to resist even a decrepit microbe. Vienna has always relied for food and other supplies on outlying districts of Austria or on neighboring countries, from which she can get next to nothing to-day. The Czechs will send her neither coal nor food, needing both for themselves. The same is true of the Galicians. Germany has little to send to Austria, and constant strikes as well as the coal shortage interfere with sending that. In a previous article, which dealt primarily with conditions along the Rhine and in occupied Germany, I reported that there was no noticeable shortage of coal or sugar in those regions. But as for sugar, there is very little of it either in Austria or in the Germany east of the Rhine; and as for coal, while there seems to be enough to warm all the houses and hotels in most of Germany, there is certainly a great shortage of it in Austria. In Austria you have this vicious circle: no coal—no transportation; no transportation—no coal; no transportation and no coal—no food.

It is reported that a certain distinguished representative of the American Government went to Vienna, put up at the best and most expensive hotel, and left the city after twenty-four hours with the breezy remark, "Oh, I guess Vienna's all right." If he had cared to stroll a little distance from the lobby of his hotel, he would have taken away quite a different impression. Of course there is good enough food to be had at the best hotels if you can afford to pay for it. But what percentage of the population of New York, for example, can afford to eat at the Biltmore even in a period of normal prices?

At the present price of exchange, an Austrian crown is worth about five cents in American money. But a crown is still a crown to an Austrian. Wages have doubled, or even trebled, since 1914, but prices have increased tenfold or more. I knew of an Austrian who had to get at least a small quantity of milk, by hook or crook, to save the life of his child. After hunting through half the shops of Vienna, he found a can of condensed milk. He got it for one hundred and sixty crowns (about eight dollars in our money, even at the present low exchange)! Another man, who decided he must have a chicken, got a small one for two hundred and twenty crowns!

Young children and old people in Austria have died by thousands. A healthy adult can stand a meager diet for a good while—in some cases it is good for him—but the children and the aged cannot stand it. While there are many children in both Germany and Austria five years of age and over, there are noticeably few under that age. A little food is already reaching the Austrians from the Allies, but the stream is yet a thin one, principally on account of the difficulties of transportation after steamers land the supplies at European ports.

At the invitation of the Czechoslovak Government, I went from Vienna to Prague. It was announced that the train which I took would be the last one for two weeks, for all the frontiers of Czechoslovakia were to be closed for a fortnight while the Austrian money in the new Republic was stamped by the Czechoslovak Government, and thus converted into a more valuable currency. But when we reached the last station before the frontier the Austrian gendarmes announced that the train would be sent back to Vienna. This was done out of spite, as a sort of reprisal against the Czechs for deciding to close the frontier. Thus several hundred unfortunate men and women who had bought tickets for stations in Czechoslovakia were sent back to Vienna. I was more lucky. At the Vienna station a Czech railway official had asked me if the C on the brassard which I wore meant "courier."

"No; it means 'correspondent,'" I said.

"Oh, that's all the same," he remarked. "If any one asks you, you tell them it means courier." So saying, he pasted on the door of my compartment a slip of paper on which was printed "Courier" in Czech spelling, and left me, remarking, "Let no one enter this compartment; it is reserved for you."

Well, when I got off the train at the station on the border to see what could be done, the conductor seized my arm and whispered:

"Come into this little baggage car. It is going on to Prague. As an American courier you can go."

With the enjoyment of one who is on the inside looking out I watched a mob of men who swarmed about the baggage car all vociferously declaring that they were couriers and had important business in Prague.

"I never saw so many couriers in my life," said the baggage-master. After much argument and inspection of credentials, about twelve of the alleged couriers were allowed to enter. The rest of the crowd, except a Czech Princess, who came with us, were sent back to Vienna, howling with natural rage and disappointment.

The Bohemian countryside is as easy to look at as any I have ever seen. Industry mingles with agriculture, factory chimneys literally rising from the midst of orchards, and both seem to be flourishing. Up to date Bohemia has been a sort of oasis in the midst of a desert of Bolshevism and industrial barrenness.

I was met at the station in Prague by representatives of a department of the Czech Ministry of Foreign Affairs which devotes itself entirely to entertaining and assisting foreigners within the country of the Czechoslovaks. They did not know I was coming, but they meet every train with motor cars, in which they convey the astonished strangers to rooms constantly reserved at the best hotels for this purpose. A very agreeable Czech officer who spoke English was placed at my disposal to use whenever I wanted him as a guide to show me about the city.

This is a characteristic instance of the energy and purpose with which the new Czechoslovak Republic is beginning its career. In some respects the rights to the frontiers which the Czechs and the Slovaks are claiming are certainly open to question (although these people are such pleasant hosts that any one who has visited their capital hates to question their right to anything they may happen to want). But it is certainly questionable, if for their own future security and the peace of Europe it is wise, for the Czechs and Slovaks to remain in possession of a city like Pressburg, only about thirty-three miles from Vienna, and with a population overwhelmingly Teutonic. In general the Czechs are following the plan of claiming almost anything to which they have a ghost of a right, and perhaps for them this is the best policy, since they will certainly get a good deal of what they claim. At any rate, the Czechoslovaks are full of admirable qualities. The whole nation is "up on its toes" every minute. The new Government is well organized, and it is pushing its way among other nations with a very well managed and carefully considered propaganda. Unquestionably the Czechs are the most energetic, the most efficient, and the most intensely patriotic people in Europe east of the Rhine to-day. As such they will deserve the important part they seem likely to play in the Middle Europe of the future.

I doubt if any city in the world has as many photographs and busts of President Wilson in its shop windows as Prague. In every case the likeness of the American President is side by side with a likeness of the George Washington of Czechoslovakia—President Masaryk.

In the streets of Prague you see hundreds of soldiers in Italian, French, or Austrian uniforms, as well as those wearing the attractive gray uniform of the new Republic. But all these soldiers are Czechs. They are men who fought for the independence of Czechoslovakia with the French and Italian armies, and thousands of them allowed themselves to be captured by the Allies when in Austrian uniform in order to fight against the Austrians later.

Prague is suffering for want of food, but Prague is not in so bad a plight as Vienna. In Vienna the pathos lies, not in what you see, but in what you do not see—markets with nothing to sell but a few carrots and cabbages, orphan asylums empty because the orphans have died.

Hungary is reported to be in as bad condition physically as Austria, but politically Hungary is the most unenviable nation in Europe. To-day the Hungarians are without friends. The Austrians at least can count on the Germans as friends, but the Hungarians can count on no one.

The probable union of Austrians with Germans is at least a natural union. But, whatever the future of the Teutons may be, let us be glad that the old conglomeration of peoples held together by force which was called the Austro-Hungarian Empire is ended.

THE IRISH AND THE ENGLISH AT CLOSE QUARTERS

BY FRANK DILNOT

A VISITOR from Mars who sought enlightenment with regard to political problems on the earth from the newspapers would get the impression that Irishmen were a fierce, relentless race, that the English were at once stolid, stupid, and brutal, and that individuals from the two countries whenever they came in contact hissed with anger and at the slightest provocation were likely to strike each other. Hostility, it would seem, must breathe through the nostrils of Englishmen and Irishmen whenever they meet, either individually or in groups. They would seem to be continually at each other's throats. The utterances of the stronger politicians on each side are largely responsible for this picture. It has an amazing sense of unreality for those who know Ireland and England, and this despite the political fight between the two sides.

The truth is that, generally speaking, the Irish hate the English politically, but get on very well indeed with them personally, and the English are filled with scorn of Irish politics but appreciate perhaps more intensely than any other people the glamour of Irish personality and the intimate charm of Irish men and women. Thus it is that Englishmen and Irishmen are both astonished at the others' mischievous and dangerous political beliefs. Just now Irish politics have entered on another phase, but it is only a continuation of the attitude of mind on both sides.

It is difficult to imagine that Irish and English leaders are ever friendly together. If one went by the published denunciations, one would conceive malignant silence or malignant words whenever people of the two countries came within range of one another. I have traveled over Ireland not only in times of quietude but also during two general elections, and I spent five years of my life in the gallery of the British House of Commons, and have seen intensive fighting by the various sections of Irishmen on behalf of their beliefs; and there is perhaps some illumination afforded by sidelights on the moods and the activities of Englishmen and Irishmen when they are brought together for social purposes, for work, or for discussion.

The atmosphere of the House of Commons is a thing not easily understood by those who are not familiar with it through actual experience. The Irish up till recently were divided into several sections—a little group revolting against the leadership of Mr. Redmond, the Redmondites themselves diverse in temperament, and the north country Irish Unionists bitterly opposed to their fellow-countrymen—but all of them together possessing in common a certain Irish outlook and Irish sympathy which was separate from every other feeling in the House. However ruthlessly they attacked one another, they nevertheless felt the call of the blood. Sir Edward Carson, with rasping voice, outstretched forefinger, mordant words, was the great Irish enemy in Parliament of Home Rule aspirations. His searing sentences on the one hand, and, on the other, the flaming words that have been hurled back at him, could never have left any doubt of the hatred between the two parties. Yet Sir Edward Carson was an Irishman. There came an occasion when young Willie Redmond, the son of his chief opponent, made his maiden speech in the House of Commons. It was Sir Edward Carson who was the first man to the table, and, turning to face his leading enemy, he paid a glowing tribute to the young Irishman's first speech, a tribute which must have warmed the elder Redmond's heart. And the tribute was cheered by all the Englishmen present as heartily as it was by the Irishmen themselves.

There is a communal spirit in the House of Commons, and all the House, even the Conservatives, strange as it may seem, had an affection for, even a pride in, these Irishmen who filled a section by themselves, who conformed to the rules of the House with punctiliousness, who steadily refused any honors or emolument under the British Government, who fought with persistence, and who never could be placated. Moreover, there were many happy and close friendships between the Irishmen and the British members, and it is certain that the Irishmen felt themselves an integral and, indeed, as they were, a very important part of that assembly, so mixed and yet in certain fundamentals possessed of a remarkable oneness of spirit. The Irishmen had their prejudices, formed against a good many Liberals and a good many Conservatives, prejudices which were reciprocal and had little or nothing to do with politics. The Speaker of the House of Commons, Mr. Lowther, a British aristocrat with a mellow humor and a kindly tolerance which arose from appreciation of many sides of life, athletics as well as literature, his farming as well as his interest in social experiments, had a warm place in his heart for the Irishmen, and they on their part respected and liked him. Many a time have I heard him call down with stern words some raucous members of his own party who were attacking the Irish. I have heard the Irish leaders pay generous tribute not only to his stern fairness but to his humaneness and his wit. The swift dialogues between the Speaker and the Irish Nationalists often brightened the House. There was an occasion where an English Liberal, forsaking his Home Rule principles on receipt of his knighthood, immediately changed to the opposite benches, and this on the last day of the session. He rose to put a question on that last day. Jerry MacVeagh sprang up from among the Nationalists before the recent Liberal could get in a word and put one of those audacious points of order which are not points of order at all, and in which the Irishmen had more freedom than any others in the House. "Mr. Speaker," he cried, "is it in order that a member who rats and gets a knighthood for it should rise to put a question from his new place on the last day of the session? Is it in order that he should change his side and join the Conservative party at this late stage?"

The Speaker rose in his place, a picture of dignity. "It is never too late to mend," he said.

An unexpected scene which might have had a painful conclusion was averted late one night by the collaboration of the Speaker with an English member. The occasion was during the last half-hour of the sitting on the motion for the adjournment, which gives opportunity for the discussion of any topic whatever. A young Irish member just back from a tour in Australia made some remarks which might have been construed into an attack on the monarch, and the House sank into a silence which was obviously the prelude to a political storm in which the name of the King would have been freely bandied about. It was a situation which in many respects would have been disastrous, for the Commons is omnipotent in the conduct of the business of the country. A dozen fiery spirits sprang to their feet to speak for and against as soon as the young member sat down. The responsible Irish leaders wanted nothing less than the damaging scene which was about to ensue. The Speaker rose to the occasion. He blandly ignored all the fire-eaters and called on a Yorkshire representative, a burly man with red hair and aquiline nose and a sense of humor which was concealed behind bland eyes and a drawling voice. "Mr. Speaker," he said, "I wish to direct the attention of the House to a matter which is of the utmost importance at the present moment." All the House sank again to the intensest silence for the continuation of the drama. "I feel," said the member, "that I can be doing no greater service to this House or to the country than by the subject which I intend to deal with at this moment." The House was at fever pitch. Even the whispers in the galleries were silenced. "The subject I wish to deal with," he said, "is the all-important one of rivers. I wish to call attention to the extreme value of rivers to the human race. There is, for instance, the Mississippi, which traverses a great part of North America, renowned for its beauty, and bringing all kinds of facilities to the people of the country in the shape of trade and commerce. The Amazon, on the other hand, is a huge body of water which I desire to compare with the little stream, also a river, running at the back of my garden in Yorkshire. They are alike in this, that the pollution in them comes from practically the same source—decaying leaves and the crumbling of the banks of clay or earth or sand." The breathless House of Commons had by this time grasped the meaning of the orator, and from a silence which was almost painful was beginning to ripple. The ripple developed into a roar. The tension was at an end. The Yorkshire member continued talking until eleven o'clock, when the sitting came to an automatic close, and the Speaker rose and said, "This House is now adjourned." I shall never forget the laughter at the performance of the Yorkshire member, laughter in which the Irish were among the foremost.

The most vehement of Irish Nationalists sometimes comes to the assistance of an English Minister whom he likes. At four o'clock one morning, after a strenuous all-night sitting, Mr. John Burns, then the President of the Local Government Board, desired to get through without opposition one or two routine departmental bills which could be passed right away so long as no voice was raised against them. One of these bills, I remember, was called "The Removal of Offensive Matter Bill," which dealt with the collection of street refuse. Mr. Burns made an appeal to the tired House to give him the bill. A foppish Conservative member, unable to make any mark in ordinary debate, chose to obstruct this bill, as he had done other bills, by the simple words, "I object." The Conservative leader appealed to him. "I object," persisted the young fop. Up sprang Mr. MacVeagh from the Irish benches. "Why does the honorable member object? I know it is the Removal of Offensive Matter Bill, but there is nothing personal in it."

Though I was a Liberal Home-Ruler in politics, I was attached to a famous Conservative paper as a descriptive writer, and when in 1910 I went to Ireland to do a series of sketches I was doubtful as to whether the name of the paper I represented would be a handicap to me in my work. I found nothing of the kind. I went into the Gresham Hotel, in Sackville Street, Dublin, and saw two of the most brilliant of the younger generation of Ireland, T. M. Kettle and Joe Devlin, sitting together in the lounge. I went up and introduced myself and told them straight who and what I was, and I could not have had a more cordial reception if I had been a blood relation. I was sitting down having a drink with them within three minutes. They offered to help me in every possible way. Despite their comparative youth, they were among the most distinguished political leaders and orators in the British Empire, but were also the most generous, good-hearted fellows I have ever met in any country. I had an even more apt illustration of the personal confidence in an Englishman two or three nights later. Mr. John Redmond, was addressing a huge meeting in the Rotunda in Dublin. After the meeting, when scores were crowding around the Irish leader, I was introduced to him and we exchanged a sentence or two. He must have suddenly realized that I, as a stranger, could be of use to him. He had to pass up an aisle through the audience towards the street and was beset not merely by those who wished to greet him but also by those desiring favors. How was he to get through the throng? He took me by the arm, "Walk with me to the street," he said. As we passed along through the thrusting people he was busy showing to me with upraised finger the various points of interest in the hall, its architectural features, and explained to me how and why I should visit it at my leisure. His attention to me was so close and courteous that it really left him little opportunity for more than a passing hand-shake and a word of greeting to all those who were thronging forward, and he reached his carriage in the street without undue delay.

I was in Cork during the famous individual election contest between Willie Redmond on the one side and William O'Brien on the other. It will be remembered that Mr. O'Brien with a few followers broke away from the Redmondites and fought them in several constituencies with varying success. Cork was Mr. O'Brien's stronghold. It was an election I shall never forget, because of the scenes so vivacious to the eye of an Englishman accustomed to the more placid contests of his native land. Two hotels provided the respective headquarters, and there were territories which were largely given over to the support of each candidate. There were demonstrations nearly every night—bands and banners, regiments of men with sticks held over their shoulders or carried upright, regiments of women as enthusiastic as men, a line of blazing tar barrels borne on planks which were mounted on the shoulders of four stalwart voters. As an Englishman, and therefore a stranger and observer, I (with others) was received hospitably by both parties and treated with much personal kindness.

I was with Willie Redmond one night in his hotel preparatory to going out with him in one of his processions. "We are going through O'Brien's district to-night," he said. I learned then that it was, so to speak, a point of honor for one side to make a tour of the other side's localities, not so much with a view to persuade or impress the opponents as to show they were not afraid of them. Two thousand women were outside the hotel, most of them workingwomen, and their fervor for Willie Redmond is a thing to be remembered. With a group of committeemen we emerged from the hotel to make our way through to the carriage, which was to be in the middle of the procession. It was a great struggle for Willie Redmond to get there, and, once he was in the carriage, it was detained by strong Irish arms which held on to the sides, and while efforts were being made by the organizers to detach the enthusiasts one middle-aged woman climbed into the carriage and kissed Willie Redmond amid the plaudits of thousands. While we were on our way through the crowded streets I stood up to get a better view of scenes which will be forever memorable, and presently Willie Redmond took hold of my arm and pulled me down. "We shall have the stones soon, now," he said. True it was. We were getting into the thick of hostile territory, and volleys of missiles from time to time were launched at us. Every one took it good-humoredly and saw nothing in the least strange about the demonstration.

Mr. O'Brien won the election, and then went out to the west of Ireland to County Mayo, where he lived, and where he had determined to fight another constituency against the Redmondites. His headquarters were at Westport, where he and his wife were extremely popular. I was present on the night he arrived fresh from his triumph in Cork. The little town hall had been cleared of seats, and he was taken there by an excited and jubilant crowd in order to speak to them and to receive their congratulations. The hall was filled with men who stood with their sticks at attention and with their eyes bright and fervent. Mr. O'Brien, heavily bearded, with shaggy eyebrows and long, wavy hair, looked like a prophet of old, as with hands clasped behind his back he delivered himself of criticisms of the Redmondite leaders. "John Dillon is coming here on Sunday. Boys, what will you do with him?" "We'll shoot him, sir!" shouted voices amid a roar. Of course they did not mean it. It was in the midst of Mr. O'Brien's intensive scorn and the furious enthusiasm among the audience that a stray Redmondite who had got in at the back of the hall ventured a mild word of dissent. Instantly the whole gathering turned on the man. The meeting was held up. It seemed to me from the platform that there was a mountain of men rearing itself at the back near the doors amid tremendous tumult. The Redmondite intruder was dealt with, and disappeared, goodness knows how or in what shape, and then the audience came back and stood at attention once more, and faced Mr. O'Brien, who had remained a stern and immovable observer of the whole. When all was quiet again, he delivered himself. "I am glad," he said, "to find that you know how to deal with a bully when you find one."

Mr. O'Brien was a perfectly delightful man personally, as kindly and soft as an Irish gentleman always is. He went out of his way to oblige me and other English correspondents more than once. One of his supporters was a distinguished Irish lawyer who had a large practice extending over a wide stretch of the country. It was to this Irishman at dinner in the hotel one evening that I conveyed the fact that I had on that day, at Achill Island, tasted "poteen," the illicit Irish whisky, colorless as water and with strength enough to fell an ox. In his kindness, he promised to secure for me a couple of bottles and send them to my residence in London. It was too delightful an opportunity to break the law for me to refuse. A few weeks later in London a package was delivered at my house containing one bottle of "poteen" and the remains of another bottle which had been broken in transit. I wrote and thanked the Irish lawyer for his kindness, mentioning incidentally the accident to one of the bottles. He wrote me back a kindly note which ran something like this: "I am sorry that one of the bottles was broken in transit, but as I have today successfully defended a man charged with manufacturing this commodity, I shall probably be able to send you another bottle by the end of the week."

It was at Westport that I learned how small a thing is mighty England to the remote parts of Ireland. I was shown a local paper dated the day after the coronation of King Edward in Westminster Abbey, an event which naturally occupied great prominence and a very large amount of space in all the English papers. This Irish journal dealt with it in a manner which presumably fully met the curiosity for news on the part of its subscribers. This was the full description which was printed: "The King of England was crowned yesterday at Westminster."

It was only in the public meetings and the newspapers that I found harsh expressions towards England, and, to tell the truth, even these were nothing like so bitter as a stranger might have expected. There was at the time a general expectation of early Home Rule, which perhaps accounted to some extent for the mildness of the talk I heard. It did not account for the geniality of the Irish towards Englishmen in person, for that is and always was a feature of the country. In England an individual Irishman is always a favorite, which is a tribute not so much to the English as to the Irish themselves.

"BABUSHKA"

A PERSONAL IMPRESSION OF CATHERINE BRESHKOVSKY

BY ANNE O'HAGAN

ONE blue, moonlit Sunday evening, bitterly cold, last February, a great crowd surged into the Church of the Ascension in New York. Long before its chimes and those of its neighbor churches had stilled their sweet, clamorous call to evening service every pew was filled, the little yard outside was packed, the sidewalk overflowed into the roadways. Across the street there were more people gathered, and around the corner and up the steps of the Ascension Parish House human beings were waiting in dense formation, hopeful for a miracle, hopeful that the granite walls might become as crystal and that they might see the sight within, or that at last it would be demonstrated how two—or ten—bodies might occupy the same space at the same time. Failing that, they waited for the satisfaction of their craving to behold the cause of their presence there when she came out again. Not since the last marriage of an American millionaire's daughter to a foreign nobleman had such a scene been witnessed in the vicinity of a New York church. This time the curiosity was more creditable to our democracy.

It was to see a woman that they were there—an old woman, a plain woman, a woman who fifty years ago gave up the husband and son whom she loved, her family and friends, and the luxuries to which she had been accustomed, because there had sounded in her heart the trumpet call to a great service. They were there, those crowding New Yorkers, to catch, if they might, a glimpse of Catherine Breshkovsky, "Babushka," the Little Grandmother of the Russian Revolution. They were there to pay tribute, the tribute at least of eager curiosity, to an old woman who had spent nearly half her whole long life and more than half her adult life in penal servitude. They were there, the most conservative of them, to acclaim a radical, a rebel against an established order of tyranny, injustice, and cruelty. They were there, stepping from their comfortably padded, warmed limousines, many of them, to honor an old woman who in her youth had traveled uncounted miles on foot to incite revolution among peasants, who had been jolted between jailers in a springless wagon along that Via Dolorosa, the great Siberian road. They were there, those comfortable land-owning people, to cheer an old woman who believed—and believes—that the land must belong to the workers of the land and that the state must be the guardian of the workers' ownership, an old woman who told the Senate of the United States quite as a matter of course that she had been for fifty years a Socialist.

It was an amazing demonstration, a demonstration of the unity that underlies all diversities. For all of them—for the extremist who quarrels with what he regards as her old-fashioned present attitude and for the reactionary who still manages to cherish a quaint belief in a Socialist as something horned and hoofed, for both of them and for all between—Babushka stands for something in which they can believe. Every day of her stay in this country has witnessed a demonstration akin to that one.

Those who succeeded in entering the Church of the Ascension saw this sight—an old woman, still strong, still vital, unbroken by years, unbroken by hardship. Her chest is deep, her shoulders broad, her neck powerful. Her face is still full and unshriveled. Her gray eyes look clearly, kindly, humorously, youthfully, upon the world in which they have witnessed such varied cruelties without ever losing belief in fundamental kindness. Only when she reads or writes does she mount silver-rimmed spectacles. Her gray hair is cut short and brushed back from a forehead as majestic as one of our own elder statesmen's. Her black sack-like dress, with the little white collar rolling over the top of it, makes elegance seem tawdry.

At home I was trying to describe the impression her appearance made upon me when a soft voice from the County Clare broke in upon me.

"Is it the old Russian lady you're talking of, ma'am?" it asked, excitedly. "I saw her—I mean the picture of her—at the movies the other night. She was coming ashore from the boat. She had on a white hood, a sort of cap, like what the old ladies at home in Ireland wear. I thought"—the voice ended wistfully—"she looked like an old Irish lady."

I saw at once that she does look like an old Irish lady. She looks like an old Swedish lady. She looks like the embodiment of all the wisdom and all the kindness of all the wise, kind old women of the world. The "Grandmother" of that Russian Revolution once acclaimed by all of us, for we are ourselves the offspring of a revolution; the "Grandmother" of four million Russian orphans, to plead for whom she, a woman of seventy-five, has crossed continents and seas—when one sees her, with her great benignancy, her strength, her wit, her humor, one must believe that she is to be the "Grandmother" of a new, peaceful, happy Russia. She is a woman whose story will live in thousands of human hearts when the name of Romanoff is as dead as that of Ptolemy.

Grandmothers of course do not continuously approve the ways of their grandchildren. What! Have the little people for whom grandma used to carry cookies in her pockets and to whom she sang Old World lullabies—have these dear little people grown up into these roisterers, these advanced young women with bobbed hair and abbreviated codes of convention, these various objectionable types? What! Has the little fellow to whom grandpa used to tell tales of Washington and Valley Forge actually dared to become a labor agitator, a pacifist, a spouter about industrial democracy? So it happens with all grandparents. How much more so with the grandmother whose revolution was the child of such almost unbelievable effort, suffering, and heroism on her part? The Bolshevik Russia of to-day Madame Breshkovsky vehemently disowns as her child and that of the old revolutionists.

The day after that cold Sunday night it was my privilege to ride with her on her trip to Boston. I handed her various questions which she had been obliged to leave unanswered the night before.

"How stupid such persons are!" she cried when I handed her this one: "Do you think that the Bolsheviks are sincere and that their only purpose is to give to the poorer class in Russia what rightfully belongs to them?"

"How stupid such persons are! Have I not already said again and again that I think the Bolsheviks traitors to the Revolution, traitors to Russia?" She spoke impatiently, but even in her impatience there is something piquant, something eternally young; it is not the peevish, impotent impatience of the aged.

I am not, alas! going to be able to make Babushka speak for you with the charm that her speaking has. Her English, which when heard from a platform is so difficult to follow, is very attractive in conversation. She learned it—think of it!—out of books while she was in prison. She enunciates all the syllables, she gives each "r" its rolling, foreign value. The family, for example, will never be "dis-solved"; it will always be "con-served." At the end of the sentence she is apt to breathe a little "yes." It is like a period, like a falling inflection, but it has a touch of music in it like the lingering vibration of the last note played on the piano.

She was in Siberia, where she had spent so many years of her life, when the Revolution came. She describes her release and her triumphal return to Petrograd and Moscow. Kerensky had sent a special order that she should not only be freed but that she should have comforts. Another well-known revolutionist sent her money for her trip home. She hired horses and drove three hundred versts to the railway. She got a good train. The officials of the road gave her a beautiful car for herself. In it she, who had traveled to Siberia between jailers, dwelt, traveled, and received the acclamations of her fellow-countrymen. Twenty thousand soldiers met her train at its first stop. She stayed at this place two days and spoke at the forums, the schools, and the colleges. When she went back to the train, soldiers lined the two miles between the hotel and the station, standing at attention as the Little Grandmother of the Revolution passed by in her carriage.

In Petrograd and Moscow, however, she found, when the first blaze of happiness had died down, that the spirit of the young people of the intelligentsia was not what it had been. Not only had the Government executed and exiled many of the leaders of the revolution of 1905, and thereby both destroyed a certain quality of leadership and intimidated thought, but schools, colleges, organizations, were under stricter rule than ever before. Parents, too, had come to be afraid to have their children think too much, learn too much. She found the new generation—or so she thought—more selfish and more frivolous than the old. The intellectual young men and women were bent upon making their own careers; the less intellectual were absorbed in easy pleasures—in the movies, in skating, in reading light novels; "in foolishness," says Babushka, with a piquant hissing of s's and a half-humorous frown. Still, for the first weeks after her return she journeyed about freely, trying to rouse among the weaklings some of the fervor of enthusiasm with which she was so richly endowed. Among her peasants, among the "dark people" whom she so understands and loves and by whom she is so adored, she found a different and a better spirit.

It happened that her return to Petrograd from her journey through the country coincided with the overthrow of the Kerensky Government. She was met by friends who wanted her to go into hiding. All the Government ministers were reported to be under arrest, "except Babushka." With the aid of loyal friends, she remained hidden for six weeks, during which she wrote articles for the "Will of the People"—signed articles—but the Bolsheviks were unable to find out from what asylum she put them forth. And then when Petrograd became too dangerous she was spirited away to Moscow with other sympathizers of the Kerensky Government. How did she manage it?

"Ah, my child, that is a secret. All my life I have moved around in Russia, and no one has known how. I am an old revolutionist. Old revolutionists do not tell these things."

For more than six months Babushka remained in Moscow, hidden in two rooms with another revolutionist, a woman with whom she had been convicted forty-five years ago. Kerensky, as wise, apparently, in the secret ways of revolutionists as the two old women, eventually joined them there. While the newspapers were announcing his presence in London or Switzerland he was spending May and June in Moscow with Madame Breshkovsky and planning with her the organization of the Resurrection of Russia Society.

Shortly after Kerensky left Moscow Madame Breshkovsky and others of the old revolutionists went through the Volga region organizing their new society, organizing opposition to the Bolsheviks. "Every place we went," she declares, earnestly, "the people begged our protection against the Bolsheviks. We traveled six hundred versts until we came to Tunice, in the Urals. It was in the hands of the Bolsheviks, as we knew, but we hoped that the conditions would not be too hard. I had not been there for twenty-two years, and all the people were unknown to me. My situation became dangerous. What should I do? I decided to go and see the medical staff. A medical staff would be civilized. My foot was hurting me—I would see the doctor and find out if she was sympathetic. So I went to the woman physician, and as soon as I began to speak I saw that she was suspicious. She went to the telephone, and when she came back she said that I had better stay in her hospital, and that if I had any other 'sick' friends they had better come too. Thus we were saved. Five days afterwards a servant came into the room and told us that the Bolsheviks were running out of the town. After nightfall the Czechoslovaks came to the village, and we were free. The peasants came to us with bread and meat. There was dancing and music and a great festival. Again I had escaped."

In Babushka's eyes, while she was recounting her latest adventures, there was life and fire—enjoyment. Would she have missed something out of her home-coming if there had been no threatened danger, no underground messages, no hairbreadth escapes?

Not all of the charges current against the Bolsheviks, however, does she admit. The tale that made the blood of the women of America run hot and cold—that tale of "nationalization" of women—she laughed at with the impatient good nature of one who hates to be stopped in her war against real things to deliver a blow at imaginary ones.

"No!" she shook her leonine head vehemently, "nothing like that. Trust the Russian peasant for that! No, there is no such regulation. Some time, some places, maybe, bad peoples make badnesses. That is all. The Russian peasant, he will have his own wife, his own children. And in Russia, you know, almost all are peasants."

This wonderful old woman, who, to become grandmother to a whole nation, gave up her own family, believes in the family as fervently as any Italian peasant woman who knows no life beyond the young life in her arms and tugging at her skirts. No misgivings as to its stability in the new world order troubles her. She believes that its roots are in the very nature of the human race; she believes in the love of man for one mate, of a woman for one mate, believes that the happiness and glory of a woman are her children—"many, many children." And she opens her arms wide to give some measure of the abounding motherliness which she believes inherent in us.

It is for the children of Russia that she is here, and not primarily, as perhaps it has sometimes seemed for a minute or two, as a witness against the present rule in her own country. All her public speeches are for the four million children whom the war has orphaned in Russia. She is begging America to send, out of its riches, everything to these children. Not money merely, though money of course will be necessary. She wants teachers, nurses, women doctors, settlement workers. She wants books. She wants instructors—men and women of every sort of craft and art as well as in book learning. In every city, near every town and village, she would have established a settlement where the orphan children of the district, to the number, perhaps, of five hundred or so, might be gathered together and taught—taught everything, kindness, truth, sobriety, industry, as well as the A B C's and all that follows after them. She wants to arouse not only a fervor of generosity, but the passion for service among our young men and women. We send missionaries out to the waste places of the earth, she says. Why not send missionaries to the Russian orphans? It will not be easy service. The comforts which surround American workers at home will be utterly lacking, but, even at that, conditions will not be what they are in Senegambia or Timbuctoo, and the reward of the service would be enough—a vital part in the building up, in the salvation, of a great nation.

She tells about the orphans as they are now. Some of them are in homes already overcrowded, already impoverished. Many are running wild upon the streets of the cities. They are beggars; they are what Babushka quaintly calls "speculators." By that she means little boys who buy packages of cigarettes or bundles of papers or what not and, by the aid of whining, cajolery, or petty thievery, endeavor to dispose of them again at a profit. Before the tremendous and immediate importance of this problem of the future of the war orphans of Russia even the settlement of Russia's political problems may well wait.

I tried to interest her in the political situation. I asked her if the state to which she looked forward in Russia after the present turmoil had quieted was a democracy of our sort. She answered briefly but convincingly. The state to which she looked forward—the state which she declares to be in existence now except for the civil war precipitated by those whom she regards as traitors—is not merely our democratic state, it is a Socialist state. There would be no buying or selling of land; land would belong to the people, and the state would insure each man his possession of his own piece. There would be absolute religious and political equality; there would be industrial democracy in so far as Russia is an industrial country. But Madame Breshkovsky does not forget to remind her interlocutor that Russia is still overwhelmingly an agricultural, instead of an industrial, country. She believes of course in the convening of a national assembly. The absolute equality of women is, naturally, axiomatic with this fine old revolutionist. She smilingly declares that women have in Russia a large measure of equality. The schools and professions have been open to the girls of the intelligentsia as well as to the boys; and among the working people certainly no inequality in labor prevails.

"And sometimes," she says, with a twinkle, "a wife will beat her husband. Yes."

I asked her how it was that she, a woman of seventy-five, who had endured long years of the most cruel hardship and oppression, had come out of them with a vigor of mind and body which put to shame that of sheltered women of half her age. I wish that it were possible for me to give her answer in her own exact words, in her own voice, so that I could make you see her musing eyes as she looked at the bright wintry landscape flashing by outside the Pullman window. By the way, Madame Breshkovsky finds it "always a festival" to ride in the train in America and look out of the car window.

When I put that question to her about the power that kept her young and vigorous, she thought for a moment; she dreamed.

"I had," she said, "a happy childhood. Yes. As a child all went well with me. My father and my mother, they were good people. Strong of body, just in their minds, kind in their hearts. Never was there a base word spoken, never a base thing done. We lived on an estate in the country and my mother herself taught us. We were not allowed to be idle. Always there was occupation for us—our books, our piano, our drawing, our embroidery. Always we were taught to be kind. Sometimes people would come to see us—simple people, plain people, poor people. We children would be sent to entertain them. Sometimes we would protest. We would complain. We did not want to go. We were doing something else. But always my mother made us go and entertain these poor people, teaching us to be courteous and hospitable. Well, as I grew older the teaching stayed in my heart and it grew to be a bigger thing. I gathered the children of the peasants on the estate together. I had a little school. I taught them. From the time I was seventeen until I was twenty-five I did this work. And then—then it was all stopped. I was not permitted to teach my peasants or to try to help them."

Thus the repression of a liberal movement became, as usual, the signal for the growth of a radical movement. The young woman, stopped in her kindly educational work, was inevitably drawn into the revolutionary movement. She had had three brothers and three sisters. Had any of them joined her?

"One sister, one only, was a—what do you call it? An idealist, like me. The others, the other brothers and sisters, they were very good people. My sister, the one I tell you of, died when she was twenty-six. The others lived and were, as I say, very good people—very honest, very upright, harming no person, letting no person harm them. But not like me and my sister. Not idealists."

She struggled to convey her idea yet more clearly to me. Her face brightened.

"Good people, like the English," she finally epitomized her kinsfolk. "But I kept on with my revolutionary work. My mother has told me that she hoped I would be a boy. When I was little, I used sometimes to feel angered, hurt, that my mother should have wished me to be not myself, but a boy. But now I sometimes think that maybe all those months she hoped I was going to be a boy gave me something strong, something inflexible, so that I did not bend before hardship and difficulty; so that I could be truly a revolutionist. Maybe the heart of the girl that longed to do things would not have been enough but for that other thing that my mother put into me, those months when she was wishing me to be a boy."

She mused again upon the mystery of life and purpose and temperament. Then she came back.

"In my mother's sitting-room," she told me, "there was a book. I used to look at the pictures before I had learned to read. Afterwards when I could read I read it again and again. It was the story of a young girl in Rome. Barbara was her name. She was the daughter of a noble, but she became a convert to Christianity—St. Barbara. Well, her father was building a great, beautiful marble bath, and one day Barbara went in to see it. There were but two windows. She asked the workmen why they had not made three. They answered her that her father had ordered only two. She bade them put in a third window, that each person in the Trinity might have due honor. By and by she persuaded them. When her father discovered the third window, he asked the workmen why they had made it. They told him that his daughter Barbara had so ordered. He asked her why. She told him that she was a Christian, and that God was three persons in one, and that therefore she had wanted the three windows made. He bade her to recant, and she would not. He ordered her flogged. There was a picture in the book in my mother's sitting-room that showed that lovely young Roman girl enduring it to be flogged. She did not recant. Her father ordered more tortures. Her breast was burned. She did not recant. Always, always, throughout my whole life, I have remembered that Roman girl who was so strong. Always when I remembered her I knew that I must never be weak. That book in my mother's room, my father and my mother who taught me to be kind, to be busy, to speak the truth—"

Babushka's wonderful eyes swam in tears as she brought them back to me from the flying landscape outside. "Sometimes, even now," she told me, "when I am hard pressed, or wavering, I still call to them. I remember the Roman girl who was so strong. I whisper to my parents: 'Father, mother, come and aid me.'"

And there you have her, the dreaming idealist who has always held in her heart the vision of that lovely young Roman martyr; the woman of tenderest, devotest family love; the heroic plotter. And what could be more touching than that at the end of so many years she should come back to the beginning—that she remembers her parents with loving fervor, that she works for her country's orphaned little ones?

WEEKLY OUTLINE STUDY OF CURRENT HISTORY

BY J. MADISON GATHANY, A.M.

HOPE STREET HIGH SCHOOL, PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Based on The Outlook of May 7, 1919

Each week an Outline Study of Current History based on the preceding number of The Outlook will be printed for the benefit of current events classes, debating clubs, teachers of history and of English, and the like, and for use in the home and by such individual readers as may desire suggestions in the serious study of current history.—THE EDITORS.

[Those who are using the weekly outline should not attempt to cover the whole of an outline in any one lesson or study. Assign for one lesson selected questions, one or two propositions for discussion, and only such words as are found in the material assigned. Or distribute selected questions among different members of the class or group and have them report their findings to all when assembled. Then have all discuss the questions together.]

I—INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

A. Topic: The Fiume-Dalmatian Dispute; Fiume and the League of Nations.

Reference: Pages 7, 12, 14-16.

Questions:

1. For what reasons is President Wilson opposed to the assigning of Fiume and territory on the Dalmatian coast to Italy? 2. The Prime Minister of Italy has received a mandate from the people of Italy backing him up in his position on the Fiume-Dalmatian question. Do you think President Wilson would receive a similar mandate from the American people backing him up in his position on this question? Reasons. 3. What facts does The Outlook give about the two parties—Italy and Yugoslavia—to this controversy? (See page 14.) 4. What facts does it also give about Fiume and Dalmatia? 5. Explain the Pact of London and the Pact of Rome. 6. Give the Yugoslav arguments in this dispute. 7. Make out a list also of the Italian arguments. 8. In your opinion, which side has the better claim in reference to the disputed territory? Discuss. 9. What does The Outlook think of President Wilson assuming the right to decide the question at issue between Italy and Yugoslavia? 10. Discuss, with reasons, whether, in your opinion, the attitude and action of President Wilson in this controversy has as important a bearing upon the project for the League of Nations as The Outlook in its editorial on page 12 says it has. 11. Do you think President Wilson should have left this Adriatic question alone? Tell why or why not. 12. You will do well to read "South-eastern Europe," by V. R. Savic (Revell), and "The Yugoslav Movement," by R. J. Kemer (Harvard University Press).

B. Topic: The New Covenant of the League of Nations; American Opinion on the League.

Reference: Page 8.

Questions:

1. How do you explain the fact that President Wilson has changed his mind regarding the proposed plan of the League of Nations? 2. What are the important changes and modifications in the League Covenant? 3. Discuss why these changes do or do not meet with your approval. Be definite. 4. What are the opinions and arguments of those who are still irreconcilable to the new League Covenant? 5. Discuss whether some more appropriate place than Geneva might have been chosen as the capital of the League. 6. How many nations are charter members of the League and how many have been invited to join it? Make out the list of the rest of the nations in the world. Give reasons why, in your opinion, these have been left out. 7. On what condition are new nations to be admitted to the proposed League? What would be "effective guarantees of their intention and capacity to conform to the principles and regulations of the League"? 8. Discuss: "The new Covenant of the League is not English, French, Italian, or American. It is the fruit of the whole world's resolve to make peace secure."

C. Topic: Disintegrating Germany; Germany: Slacker Among Nations; What the World Owes Germany.

Reference: Pages 17-20; 12, 13.

Questions:

1. What are Mr. Mason's reasons for believing that the Germans know they are beaten? 2. Do you agree with Mr. Mason when he says that if Germany "should be allowed to build a fleet and an army greater than the fleet and army just dismantled, the world need never fear her again as it feared her before"? Discuss. 3. Make several comparisons between what Mr. Green and Mr. Mason say about Germany and conditions in Germany. 4. The Peace Conference has decided to allow foodstuffs to go into Germany. Discuss whether this decision is wise. 5. What, in your opinion, are some of the things Germany really needs to learn? 6. What, according to The Outlook, does the world not owe Germany? 7. Does the world owe Germany anything? Discuss at length. 8. Outline a system of discipline for the Germans. Discuss whether it is possible to punish them sufficiently for what they have done.

II—PROPOSITIONS FOR DISCUSSION

(These propositions are suggested directly or indirectly by the subject-matter of The Outlook, but not discussed in it.)

1. William II should be executed in the same manner as was Charles I, King of England. 2. President Wilson should ask Postmaster-General Burleson to resign.

III—VOCABULARY BUILDING

(All of the following words and expressions are found in The Outlook for May 7, 1919. Both before and after looking them up in the dictionary or elsewhere, give their meaning in your own words. The figures in parentheses refer to pages on which the words may be found.)

Conciliation, arbitration, compromise (12); a country, a people, a nation, a state, autonomy, pact (14); hinterland (15); blatantly, temporize (18); ban, ad infinitum (19); entrepreneur, simulate, neurasthenia (20).

A booklet suggesting methods of using the Weekly Outline of Current History will be sent on application

Fifty Years of Service

"There is no legacy so rich as honesty"

—All's Well that Ends Well

This statement by the Company's Chairman, forms the concluding page in a Semi-Centennial booklet just published.

A copy will be sent to you free, upon request.

WITH entire sincerity I can say that I believe the guiding principle of those by whom this company has been built up has been Honesty, of purpose and of endeavor. Honesty in design and production, that each article shall be right for its purpose. Honesty in representation, that the buyer shall not be misled. Honesty in pricing, that quality shall not be sacrificed to cheapness. Honesty in all relations, with employees, customers and the public.

While it is true that this business has grown because it has prospered, it is equally true that it has prospered because it has grown.

Barrett Specification Roof on Round House of the Southern Railway System at Finley Yard, Birmingham, Ala.

Meeting the severe conditions of railroad service—

THE giant round-house pictured above with stalls for twenty-five locomotives, and all the other buildings of the Southern Railway System shown on this page, are covered with Barrett Specification Roofs.

The construction officials of the Southern Railway System used Barrett Specification Roofs because they knew they would stand up well under the severe conditions of railroad service.

Neither the intense heat directly under a round-house roof, nor showers of red-hot sparks, nor the hot sulphurous gases from the locomotive smoke-stacks have any terrors for a Barrett Specification Roof.

Lowest Cost Per Year of Service

Years of service on all types of flat-roofed buildings, under every condition imaginable, have proved conclusively that a Barrett Specification Roof is the best roof to be had regardless of price; and, what is more to the point, that it costs less per year of service than any other type of permanent roofing.

Barrett Specification Roofs require no maintenance; take the base rate of insurance and are absolutely guaranteed for 20 years.

The 20-Year Guaranty Bond

This guaranty is in the form of a 20-year Surety Bond issued by the U. S. Fidelity & Guaranty Company of Baltimore and is furnished without charge.

We offer this bond on all Barrett Specification Roofs of 50 squares and over in all towns of 25,000 population and more and in smaller places where our Inspection Service is available. Our only requirements are that the roofing contractor shall be approved by us and that The Barrett Specification dated May 1, 1916, shall be strictly followed.

The Teeth Problem Is Up to You

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

This You Must Decide

Do you think your present methods of teeth cleaning are sufficient to save your teeth?

We think you know they are not. Teeth still discolor, still decay. Tartar still forms on them. And most folks at some time, despite their brushing, suffer pyorrhea.

Statistics show that tooth troubles are constantly increasing, yet the tooth brush never was so widely used as now.

Science has found the reason. It lies in a film—a slimy film—which you feel with your tongue. That causes most tooth troubles.

That film is what discolors—not your teeth. It hardens into tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. So that film is your teeth's great enemy.

You brush teeth and think you have cleaned them. But much of that film remains. It clings to the teeth, gets into crevices, hardens and stays. It is doing a ceaseless damage, while you ignore it, relying on tooth-brush protection.

There is now a way to combat that film—a way proved and approved by many high authorities. It is easily used and as pleasant as any other tooth paste, but it does what nothing else can do.

That way is called Pepsodent. We urge you to try it, then decide for yourself if you want it.

A 10-Day Revelation

What we urge is a 10-day test. It will cost you nothing. Compare the results with your present results, and decide which you prefer.

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of pepsodent is to dissolve it. Then, day by day, to prevent its accumulation.

The use of pepsin seems simple, but it long seemed impossible. Pepsin must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. Today it is possible because science has found a harmless activating method. Five governments have already granted patents on it.

Dental authorities subjected Pepsodent to every form of clinical test. Years were spent in proving it before it was offered to users. Today its results are known beyond question, and dentists all over America are urging its adoption.

See what it does. Send this coupon for a 10-day Tube. Use it like any tooth paste. Note how clean your teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the film. See how teeth whiten—how they glisten—as the fixed film disappears.

Do this for your own sake. See the effects, read the reasons for them, then judge if you want them continued. A delightful surprise awaits you. Cut out the coupon now.

This Department will include descriptive notes, with or without brief comments, about books received by The Outlook. Many of the important books will have more extended and critical treatment later

FICTION

Big Flat. By Henry Oyen. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

A capital story of a determined young farmer's fight with the land and for the land, and against a land corporation which attempts to buy him out, drive him out, or drown him out. How he rallied his slow-thinking, unresourceful neighbors into an association and how they won out makes an inspiring tale even if it does involve a little lynch law against inanimate objects. The story is dramatic, moves rapidly, and is far from being socially preachy. It has the essence of American independence in its spirit.

Flower o' the Lilly. By Baroness Orczy. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

A mediæval tale of France, the scene of which is Cambrai, now so famous as a war center. It is of the "sword and cloak" order, with chivalry, romance, loyalty, and love, all involved in adventure and war.

Glenmornan. By Patrick MacGill. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

A graphic, visualized picture of a remote and poor little Irish district which yet has romance and passion and humor in abundance.

I've Come to Stay. By Mary Heaton Vorse. The Century Company, New York.

Greenwich Village and its inhabitants are here laughed at, but affectionately; and there is glamour, if not about the place, yet surely about the young people here described. Especially a perverse, precocious, and passionately enthusiastic little girl remains a distinct memory. The little tale has charm and appeal.

Jervaise Comedy (The). By J. D. Beresford. The Macmillan Company, New York.

A gentle, quietly entertaining story of English country life. The situations and complications attending and following a half-executed but abandoned elopement are novel and the play of character and purpose is spirited. It is not one of Mr. Beresford's biggest books, but it has quality and refinement of tone.

Nomads of the North. By James Oliver Curwood. Illustrated. Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City.

A capital tale of the adventures of a lost and orphaned baby bear and a puppy dog in similar plight who join their fortunes and struggle together for existence.

Undeclared (The). By J. C. Snaith. D. Appleton & Co., New York.

No sweeter-natured story has grown out of the war. The ennobling influence of devotion and courage on men and women ordinarily narrow and dull, or aggressive and boastful, is developed quietly, simply, yet most impressively. Hollis, the weak, rather sudden little greengrocer, a total failure in life, becomes a stern soldier, and a latent idealism makes him a blood-brother to the famous painter who fights by his side and dies in his arms. So with the hard, cross, hopeless Mrs. Hollis; she becomes actually human, and her feeling for her husband changes from cold indifference to something like romance. So too, with Hollis's overbearing rich father-in-law, who rules the town and all in it; he becomes sympathetic, helpful, and now works for his country as forcefully as before for himself. Mr. Snaith has handled his people and

Linen Specials at McCutcheon's

TWO very interesting shipments of Damask Linen Table Cloths and Napkins have just reached us from bond. These Cloths and Napkins were purchased early in 1918, which makes it possible for us to quote especially attractive prices.

LOT No. 1 is of Scotch full-bleached Linen Damask in our own regular makes and patterns.

Breakfast Napkins, $7.00, 7.50, 8.00, 8.75, 9.50 the dozen and up.

Dinner Napkins, $8.75, 9.00, 10.00, 10.50 the dozen and up.

Table Cloths, 2x2 yds., $7.00, 7.25, 8.00, 8.50, 9.50, 10.50 each and up.

Table Cloths, 2x2½ yds., $8.50, 8.75, 9.50, 10.00, 12.00 each and up.

(Other sizes at proportionate prices.)

LOT No. 2 comprises a good variety of Cream and half-bleached Irish Damask, which we very strongly recommend as being especially suitable for hard use. Nothing could be better for the bungalow and the country home, where moderation in price is desired.

Each washing adds to the appearance of these Linens and tones them to an attractive silver grey. If dried in the sun, these cloths will eventually turn white.

The quantities are limited; therefore we urge our Patrons to make their purchases as promptly as possible.

Cloths, $6.75, 7.75, 8.50, 9.00 and 9.75 each.

72-inch Piece Goods, $4.25 and 4.50 per yard.

22-inch Napkins, $7.75 the dozen.

WAR BOOKS

Air Men o' War. By Boyd Cable. E. P. Dutton & Co., New York.

The work of the airmen sketched in semi-fiction form with animation and knowledge.

Bulwark Against Germany (A). By Bogumil Vosnjak, LL.D. The Fleming H. Revell Company, New York.

This volume instructs us about that branch of the Slavs which, curiously enough, seems the least known—the Slovenes. They number approximately fifteen hundred thousand souls; they live in the Hinterland of Triest and in Istria. The present volume explains their historical, political, social, and economical evolution, and abundantly shows that, as the westernmost branch of the Jugoslavs, they do indeed constitute a bulwark against Germany.

Grand Fleet (The) 1914-1916: Its Creation, Development, and Work. By Admiral Viscount Jellicoe of Scapa, C.C.B., O.M., G.C.V.O. Illustrated. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

We have already spoken editorially of this important contribution to naval history. Some of Admiral Jellicoe's disclosures about the battle of Jutland not only justify his own tactics as commander, but make England's undoubted victory in that battle even more creditable because the disparity between the two fleets at that time and place was less than has been supposed. The chapter on Kitchener and his last days is particularly interesting.

Lilies, White and Red. By Frances Wilson Huard. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

Stories and sketches of the people of France, written in appreciation of their faith and steadfastness in sorrow and suffering.

Way to Victory (The). By Philip Gibbs. 2 vols. Vol. I—The Menace; Vol. II—The Repulse. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

In these volumes Mr. Gibbs describes some of the darkest hours and also the most triumphant ones of the war. His chapters bring the reader close to the scene of battle; they are full of detail and require close reading to get the picture of the conflict as a whole, but they have the swing and intensity of interest of a story by the man who writes while the action is hot, who tells his experience out of a full heart and mind, and who has a fine command of all the resources of vivid description.

World War and Its Consequences (The). By William Herbert Hobbs. Introduction by Theodore Roosevelt. G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

Last autumn Theodore Roosevelt said that if he could choose only one book concerning the war to be put in the hands of every man and woman in the United States he would choose the present volume. Professor Hobbs states the conditions that have made Germany a menace to the world and also the conditions that led to our failure to act as we should have done during the first years of the war, and what is most needed in order that we may perform our National and international duty. The information and frank opinions given in these pages are evidently inspired by Mr. Roosevelt's conviction that "a half truth may be the veriest falsehood." We are glad that a chapter was added giving some account of the Bolshevik menace.

High Blood Pressure —Hardened Arteries —How to Remedy

By R. L. ALSAKER, M.D.

(Specialist in Health Conservation)

R. L. ALSAKER, M.D.
Founder and Director
THE ALSAKER WAY

Dear Doctor Alsaker:

Last week I had two severe shocks. One of my friends had a stroke of apoplexy and is now in a very serious condition; another one dropped dead. Both of them are a little past fifty, and both of them have suffered from high blood pressure for some time. I am anxious because I too am past fifty, and my blood pressure runs from 190 to over 200. From time to time I have discomfort in the region of the heart and pains in the head.

A third friend tells me that he followed your directions and recovered. He is active and looks healthy, but I can hardly believe this, for my physicians—and they are good ones—have informed me that high blood pressure can not be reduced. Please write me frankly by return mail. I want to linger here a while longer.

F. R. M.

The condition mentioned in this letter is very common among men past the age of forty-five. This is a case of hardening of the arteries (arteriosclerosis) with high blood pressure. An examination nearly always shows more or less Bright's disease, and this is generally caused by the excessive pressure, which forces the albumin through the kidneys.

The pain in the region of the heart is due to the over-worked condition of the heart, which is often aggravated by gas in the stomach and the bowels. The pain in the head is caused partly by the excessive pressure of the blood, and partly by accumulations of waste in the body.

Many physicians give nitro-glycerin to lower the excessive blood pressure, but this is useless, for though the pressure is temporarily reduced, it returns again.

The condition described is dangerous because if allowed to continue the patient will usually expire from apoplexy of the brain, or heart failure; sometimes death comes through Bright's disease, with its accompanying uremia.

Is the condition curable? It is in the majority of cases. Nearly everybody believes that hardened arteries with high blood pressure is a fatal affliction. And it is, if it is treated in the old way with drugs and a superabundance of food. If it is treated correctly, that is, in accordance with the laws of nature, at least four out of five will recover. Their arteries may not become quite as soft as they should be; their blood pressure may not return to the ideal point; but they will recover to such an extent that they have neither aches nor pains, nor are they in any further danger from apoplexy or heart disease. They will recover so completely that they can live to be old—rar older than three score years and ten—and they can be so healthy that they can't feel anything wrong. And what more can they ask?

In most of these cases correct treatment will reduce the blood pressure from twenty to thirty points the first month. After that the reduction is slower.

If this is true, why don't most doctors and many laymen know it? Because both physicians and lay individuals are looking for cures from pills, powders and potions, aided by serums and operations. And these means will not work in cases of high blood pressure.

The correct way, which is Nature's way, is so simple and reasonable that very few have discovered it to date. It consists of living so that the hardening process stops immediately, and then the blood pressure begins to decrease. Usually the patient is out of danger in a few weeks.

So if you would overcome high blood pressure and soften arteries that are too hard you will have to learn how to use your lungs to get plenty of fresh air;

how to drink the right kind of liquids so as to aid in washing the impurities out of the body; how to eat the best of foods in the best way, so that these foods will build health instead of producing disease; and how to give the body good general care in every way.

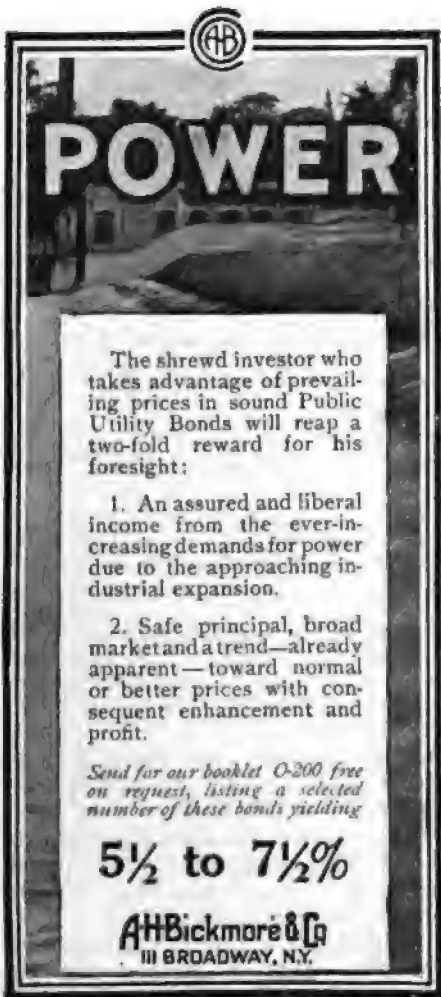

There are exceptions who can not recover. This is because they have abused themselves so long that either the kidneys have failed beyond recovery, or the heart valves or heart walls have been too much injured, or the walls of the arteries themselves have become as brittle as chalk in spots. But the vast majority—at least four out of five on the average—can get into such good condition that they can truly say that they are enjoying good health.

I have had patrons who were continually dizzy; who had surging of the blood to the head; who had daily headaches; who had oppression in the region of the heart (precordial pain); who were so short of breath that they could not walk upstairs, nor could they walk as much as a block without resting—yes, individuals with as bad symptoms as that have recovered very good health after they had been told by competent physicians that nothing could be done for their hardened arteries and high blood pressure.

Nature performs wonders if you give her a chance. If you are truly interested, read the publisher's announcement following this article.

Publisher's Announcement and Personal Guarantee—R. L. Alsaker, M.D., is a new type of physician. He specializes in health and teaches those who come to him for advice how to live so that disease will vanish. He has written several health-building handbooks that explain the cause of disease and show the sick how to recover. One of the most important is "Curing Diseases of Heart and Arteries." This book is really a course of instructions on the correct home treatment of Heart Disease, Hardened Arteries, High Blood Pressure and Apoplexy. It gives specific advice on the care of the body and the proper foods to eat to produce a cure. All forms of heart disease are discussed and a correct home treatment prescribed. It is marvelous what the common foods will do for the sick when properly combined and intelligently eaten. Send $2.10 for "Curing Diseases of the Heart and Arteries." Follow the doctor's advice regarding the care of the body and especially The Alsaker Way of food combining and eating, for 30 days. If you are fully satisfied with the good results obtained keep the book; otherwise return it and I will refund your money. George G. Porter, a prominent business man of Syracuse, N. Y., writes, "Measured by the usual fees charged by physicians for a single consultation and prescription, Dr. Alsaker's health-building handbooks are worth $50 to $100 each." Mr. Porter has purchased and distributed among sick people more than 200 copies of The Alsaker Handbooks.

AMERICA'S OBLIGATION AND OPPORTUNITY

DURING the past four years the financial status of each and every country has experienced a great transmutation, but the conversion was so gradual and modified, as each phase was supplanted by another, that now as we look about us we perceive a complete transformation. Probably the most intricate problem confronting us to-day is the relation in its financial aspect that the United States bears to the rest of the world.

Before we can develop our foreign trade we must create foreign credits and amplify our foreign financial plans and agreements. We have become a creditor nation, and a large part of the world's gold is held within our boundaries. The ratio of exports over imports has constantly increased from about one-half a billion to over three and one-half billions, and probably the question of greatest import to-day is how Europe is to pay us for the commodities we are shipping and will continue to ship to her in ever-increasing amounts. She must be given credit and more credit, for she cannot pay in gold; without injuring our own industries we must buy from Europe everything possible, for we cannot export to her if we do not accept and encourage her importation, so that one may balance the other to some extent. Europe is again to become our customer, and what a distressed and complicated plight she is in!

Russia and the Central Empires present grave problems indeed, for a world which has been engaged in destruction for the past four years necessarily finds it difficult to turn at once to the business of formative construction and lucrative production. Readjustment cannot come in a few weeks under the burden of enormous debts, after so long a period of unproductiveness, when wealth has been diminishing at a terrific rate of speed. The remarkable forced exertion of strength and energy which has been expended on mutual destructiveness must now be applied to and concentrated upon the upbuilding of the industrial activity of each of the contestants. What really amounts, in some cases, to a peaceful internal revolution exists throughout the world to-day, and this may be approached in only the most delicate manner; only time can adjust this feeling of unrest satisfactorily to all concerned.

When we are confronted by the many complex phases of the financial conditions of the countries to which we must lend credit, upon which we must depend for reimbursement for the goods we shall ship abroad, it is indeed confusing if not discouraging. The countries of Europe owe us to-day about ten billion dollars, but we must finance them, however black the situation may appear. We must supply them with raw materials, and we can expect to supply them with credits for some time to come. Supplying credits to Europe means, to a large extent, buying its securities, but to accomplish this they must be made attractive to the investor, after a campaign of education has been waged to accustom the investing public to the idea. The sooner we realize that this task must be met, the better for the world of commerce; for it is our duty and our opportunity to supply the means for Europe to re-establish herself, to feed her people and give work to her men, and at such time as these starved peoples shall feel assured that their hungry bodies will be fed we may confidently expect a diminishing tendency toward social unrest and lawlessness. We must help them to help themselves, feed them now so that they may later supply their own wants from their own labors. We must aid them to regain their old spirit of hope, and this is perhaps our most difficult task.

The people of Europe must be endowed with energy and animation; whereas some have a great deal, in others it is practically benumbed or dead. Let America set the example and back this up by her enormous wealth, to enable the weak to regain a working foothold. We have come away victorious, and, if for no other motive than selfishness, we cannot afford to withhold helping hands, for we cannot hope to prosper and enjoy a state of well-being undisturbed if humanity, expressed in millions, lives in a state of anarchy and distress. This international problem is one for every American to consider and attempt to solve. It is a problem for each one of us; complex and intricate, to be sure, but not beyond us if we attack it with the purpose of mastering it.

The productive capacity of this great country has been expanded by the war, far beyond our former vision. What shall we do to take care of this expansion? Create new markets for our goods and increase the potentialities of our former channels of trade; and in attempting both of these we may expect the keenest competition. Economic waste and inefficiency will have to be reduced to a minimum, goods must be standardized, and the art of buying and the science of selling more carefully studied and developed. The cost of production and transportation will become more vital elements than ever before. Our constantly growing merchant marine must be able to compete with foreign ship-owners to an extent it has never been able to before. Whatever questions may arise, it is certain that the financial and industrial power of America will be drawn on to its full extent if order is to be obtained from present chaotic conditions.

If America is to hold her position of industrial and financial leadership, we must become investors not only in our own Government bonds, but in foreign securities as well. Europeans now own fewer American securities, and consequently have lost the lucrative income they formerly enjoyed from them. It is estimated that between $2,000,000,000 and $2,500,000,000 of American paper was held abroad, and $2,000,000,000 more was lent to Europe before we entered the conflict. Since that time about $3,000,000,000 in the form of loans has been advanced to the Allies. We hold about one-third of the total gold coin and bullion of the world, and we have an enormous trade balance in our favor. We do not want more gold, and we cannot hope for some time to buy from Europe any quantity of her goods which could materially reduce this trade balance; therefore how can we hope to obtain a settlement from Europe of her indebtedness to us unless we shall establish foreign credits in the shape of collaterally secured loans?

These must be made interesting to the American investor, for, if the private investor does not buy, the financial institutions will be forced to; and the same arguments which hold against the policy of overloading the banks with our own Liberty Bonds exist to possibly a greater extent in regard to foreign obligations in order that America may hold the position she now

"A ship's name," says "Shipping," "should be a short word, to facilitate cabling, signaling, phoning, sighting at sea, and remembrance. It should be spelled easily and be pronounceable by illiterate persons. A large proportion of the names listed on the Shipping Board's Register fail to meet these conditions. Among the names listed are many like 'Osawatomie,' 'Sagadahoc,' 'West Loquassuck,' and 'Lake Ypsilanti.'" The point seems a good one, but many famous ships have had difficult names. The warship to which Napoleon surrendered was the Bellerophon, nicknamed the "Bully Ruffian" by British sailors; the Téméraire was another famous British war-vessel; the Bonhomme Richard was Paul Jones's flagship; and the Constitution and the Guerrière are hardly to be classed as examples of simple nomenclature.

At a trial for assault and battery, "Harper's Magazine" says, a Southern darky testified that the man who was knocked down lay on the ground five minutes. The opposing lawyer tried to discredit the witness, and, pulling out his watch, asked the Negro to tell him when five minutes had elapsed. The witness told him correctly. The astonished lawyer later asked for an explanation. "Why, boss," was the reply, "I jest figured it out." "But how?" "Why, by de clock on de wall behind you, sah."

Merit does not always give a man a place in the encyclopædias, or, if he does get in, assure correctness in describing his fame. Thomas Pringle, author of the poem "Afar in the Desert," which is printed in almost every anthology and which Coleridge considered "among the two or three most perfect lyric poems in our language," has only a casual reference in the greatest British cyclopædia, none in the latest American cyclopædia, and in another American cyclopædia his famous poem is called "A Farm in the Desert."

A hospital doctor writes in the "Ontario Post" that one of his patients had had the flu. He was seen walking around wearily. When he was asked what was wrong, he said: "Ah done had de Spanish flu." "That so?" he was asked; "what is the Spanish flu like, Sam?" "The flu," said Sam, "don't you-all know what de flu is? Why, it's a disease dat makes you sick six months after you gets well."

A grim-faced matron approached the window at the bank, says the story-teller of the "Typographic Messenger," and said: "I want to know how much money my husband drew out of the bank last week." "I am sorry, but I cannot give you this information," was the answer. "Well, the impudence!" snapped the woman; "aren't you the Paying Teller?" "I am, madam," was the calm reply; "but I am not the Telling Payer."

"You think Oriental rugs are a luxury and bought only by the rich?" said a New York City retail dealer in rugs the other day. "Why, a colored woman living in a rear tenement came in here not long ago and bought a hundred-dollar rug. She had the money with her, too. I was astonished, I admit. But you see she had no doubt lived as a cook in a fine house and had acquired the taste for good things."

"When I was a cub printer on the Moberly 'Daily Monitor,'" says a correspondent of the "American Printer," "the office rule was to abbreviate the names of States. An overly-dressed woman pranced in on us one day and wanted to know who gave in the information that she was 'colored folks.' No one could explain the mystery until she pointed an accusing finger at the line: 'The newcomers are Col. folks, and we bespeak for them a hearty welcome in our city.' We merely meant that they came from Colorado, but she insisted we had slandered her. After that we printed State names in full."

Among first editions treasured by a New York bibliophile are fifty-six volumes of Captain Mayne Reid's stories. Even this portentous list of the prolific author's works is not complete. "Afloat in the Forest," originally published in that favorite magazine of the boys and girls of yesteryear, "Our Young Folks," and "Odd People," are not included. Captain Reid was of Irish birth, but he came to the United States as a young man and served in the Mexican War. His first book, "The Rifle Rangers," was based on his experiences in that war. His books are still in demand in the libraries.

An American unused to court etiquette was invited, just before the war, says "Collier's," to dine with a German prince. A glittering flunky presented a silver plate to him just before the hors-d'œuvres were served. He blushed, fumbled in his pockets, then said to himself, "I have nothing but a ten-dollar note, but I don't think any German dinner is worth ten dollars," so he let the plate pass. He then discovered that the plate was intended to receive the white gloves that he ought to have worn!

Nemesis, or whatever we may call the fatality of natural causes, seems to lie in wait for every inattentive human being. Here is a strange example: At Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, a passenger train, according to the "Railway Age," was recently derailed near a grain elevator. The locomotive knocked down a part of the wall of the building, causing the rupture of several grain bins. The resulting avalanche of grain overwhelmed the engine and two cars, and the engineman, fireman, and one other man were smothered to death.

Even better than money

"A. B. A." Cheques are better than actual money for the traveler for several reasons: They are more convenient to carry—less bulky. They are safer, because no one can use them until you have countersigned them. Your countersignature on an "A. B. A." Cheque in the presence of the person accepting the cheque, is the only identification required.

They do not have to be changed into another kind of money when you go from one country into another. They are like dollars in the United States and Canada; like pounds, shillings and pence in the United Kingdom and the British Colonies; like francs in France, lire in Italy, and so on. In other words they are accepted internationally for payment of goods and services—"The safest, handiest travel funds."

Get them at your bank, or write Bankers Trust Company, New York, for booklet and information as to where they may be had in your vicinity.

Training for Authorship

How to write, what to write,
and where to sell.

Dr. E. Esenwein

for many years editor of Lippincott's Magazine, and a staff of literary experts. Constructive criticism. Frank, honest, helpful advice. Real teaching.

One pupil has received over $5,000 for stories and articles written mostly in spare time—"play work," he calls it. Another pupil received over $1,000 before completing her first course. Another, a busy wife and mother, is averaging over $75 a week from photoplay writing alone.

There is no other institution or agency doing so much for writers, young or old. The universities recognize this, for over one hundred members of the English faculties of higher institutions are studying in our Literary Department. The editors recognize it, for they are constantly recommending our courses.

We publish The Writer's Library. We also publish The Writer's Monthly, especially valuable for its full reports of the literary market. Besides our teaching service, we offer a manuscript criticism service.

When Fate and Fire Throw Dice

A TINY SPARK, a sputtering flame—then a raging furnace of heat, fire and destruction; another town or perhaps a whole city desolated, gutted; wiped completely off the earth; victims of the red scourge!

When will it stop?

By some weird schedule, yet with remarkable accuracy, fate and fire pick their path—and it's usually across the inflammable roofs of a community. And what is to halt the progress of roof-to-roof fires unless it is a roofing which resists fire and stops its spread?

Such roofings are of Johns-Manville Asbestos, a mineral which satisfies every roofing requirement as to durability and economy, and, in addition, adds the supreme quality of fire-protection.

When the greatness of Johns-Manville contribution to a "fire-safe America" is fully realized, there will be a better understanding of ASBESTOS, a clearer appreciation of its uses—and, most important of all, there will be fewer fires.

Johns-Manville Asbestos Roofings are made in many forms so that now every building can have the protection it needs. Johns-Manville Asbestos and Colorblende Shingles for homes. Johns-Manville Brooks and Flex-tone Ready Asbestos Roofing, for sloping roofs or large permanent buildings. Johns-Manville Built-Up Roofing for all flat surfaces, and Johns-Manville Corrugated Asbestos Roofings for skeleton frame buildings.

THE VICTORY LOAN AN AMAZING SUCCESS

FEW doubted that the four and one-half billion dollars' worth of Victory Loan Notes offered by the Government would be taken up, but there was doubt whether the new loan, like its four predecessors, would be taken up in large proportion by small subscribers. While exact figures are not yet available, it is estimated as we write that at least fifteen million separate persons purchased the new securities. This, to be sure, is a smaller number than subscribed in the preceding loan, but that loan was for six billions and was raised under the immediate stress of actual war. It is a triumph also that the new loan was very much over-subscribed—probably a billion and a half dollars above the amount asked for. The Government had in advance declared its intention not to accept over-subscriptions; it will scale down only the large amounts subscribed—those over $10,000 each. Every district in the country exceeded its quota of subscription. In every respect the placing of the loan was not merely successful, but exceeded even sanguine expectations.

It is evident that the great body of the American people felt both a duty and a desire to stand behind the Government's war debts. It is evident also that there was a large amount of accumulated profits and income available for the purchase of National securities—a greater amount and more widely subdivided than most people thought. That such a loan should be negotiated without disturbing the market values of other securities and in a sound and hopeful condition of the country's money and stock markets is decidedly gratifying as an indication of actual business prosperity.

One important element in the success of the loan was its exceeding attractiveness as an investment. The small investor saw the advantage of that form of the notes which bears interest at  $4\frac{3}{4}$  per cent and is exempt from any taxation with the exception of the super-income tax, which does not largely affect the small investor; on the other hand, the big investor or company saw the advantage of the form of the bond which bears interest at  $3\frac{3}{4}$  per cent and involves no income tax even on the super-income.

The total amount which the people of the country have loaned to the Government in the five great drives and in the purchase of War Stamps may be roughly stated to be a little over twenty-two billion dollars. But about ten billion dollars of this was not expended by the United States in war but loaned to our allies, and on that portion our Government does not, of course, pay interest. It would be too sanguine to assume, because the loan just completed is understood to be the last to be raised by a "drive," that the expenditure of the Government in war has been entirely provided for, and that it has nothing else to do but to pay interest on the loans. There are still a good many outstanding obligations, and necessary expenditure must be incurred in the future but growing out of the war. No doubt the period of high taxation must continue for some time to come.

It would be impossible to praise too highly the efficiency and energy of the publicity managers in all the great public loans; they have done remarkable work, and very largely purely through patriotism and without compensation. In one way or another they have brought home to every one in the country the opportunity and the patriotic obligation involved. The people have become partners with the Government in making it possible to carry out the stupendous undertaking upon which we entered when we joined the Allies in the effort to overthrow Pan-Germanism and ruthlessness.

TWO AMERICAN WITNESSES

Thomas W. Lamont is one of the best known and most competent of American financiers. He is a member of the permanent Armistice Commission, and has been visiting Luxemburg, Trèves, and Coblenz. In an interview with Mr. Grasty, of the New York "Times," he has given a picture of the contrast between Germany and France that ought to be kept in the mind of all Americans. "The steep heights above the Moselle, which enters the Rhine at Coblenz," said Mr. Lamont, "are crowded with hops and grapes. Nowhere is there a sign of war and the countryside is untouched and smiling." And he adds:

The interior of Germany shows suffering and hunger, but not the Rhine towns. The children there are robust and stoutly clad.

It was Easter morning when I was there, and the whole German population swarmed on the streets bound for churches. The German burghers with bell-crowned stovepipe hats, the Hausfrauen in black with their lace collars, little children in their best dresses, seemed happy and content, already forgetting that they were ruled by a victorious foe.

The contrast between this scene and those in northern France or Belgium rouses one's ire. Here was ease and plenty, even if the enemy's flag waves over them. Back in northern France were blackened waste, desolation, want, distress, and misery. Agricultural implements had been stolen to cultivate the vineyards of Coblenz. There the little children are pinched and ill-clad, but in Coblenz even the dogs are fat.

Mr. Lamont furthermore testifies that Alsace, even in six months, has "melted completely into France." And he gives these picturesque specifications:

The old men with their long, square beards, who were youths of twenty-one when the Treaty of Frankfort was signed, are now coming back into their own. They are already forgetting how to speak German. . . . The German imperial arms, etched in marble on the fronts of all public buildings, have been chiseled off, and the Fleur de Lis of France in fresh white marble is taking their place. . . . These are but outward symbols, but they are significant. As to the inward industrial life the change is more significant. . . . The case of important mines near Colmar is typical. . . . The Germans were supposed to be efficient, but already under French management the output of potash mines has almost doubled and will continue to increase.

The bridges which the Germans destroyed for no military purpose will take years to rebuild, Mr. Lamont said. Meanwhile southern Alsace-Lorraine will be crippled and her industries held back. "That is what Germany wanted," was Mr. Lamont's comment. "That is what Germany planned. That was the scheme of permanent deviltry. That is what she must pay for, and to the limit. Those are the acts the remembrance of which will make the Chiefs of State stern and obdurate when at Versailles German delegates plead their incapacity to pay full reparation for the damage done."

And Dr. Vernon L. Kellogg, who served first with the Belgian Relief Commission and then in the service of the American Food Commission in investigating food conditions in several European countries, has just returned and given his testimony. According to him, as to almost all the other witnesses who have been in Germany, the people of Germany are still unvanquished in their own opinion. Although he recognizes the need of sending food to Germany to minimize the danger of Bolshevism, he says that the Ebert Government is "capitalizing Bolshevism" and is "deliberately painting a false background to the events of the war." Mr. Kellogg is quoted as saying that "it is clear to every foreigner in Germany that the armistice was a mistake; that only a surrender could give that correct background to events."

These are some facts that it is well to keep in mind when we are considering the terms of the Treaty.

As "F. P. A.," in the New York "Tribune," has remarked: "Those who believe the Treaty is too severe forget, perhaps, that the war also was too severe."

CROSS-OCEAN AIR-FLIGHTS

Whatever plane and whatever aviator may win the honor of first crossing the Atlantic, or even if the attempt fails, the public at large has had a valuable course of aeronautical education through the preparation for the proposed flights. What one type or another is best suited for, what are the respective advantages and disadvantages of airplane, seaplane, and dirigible, what practical value attends the air-crossing of the Atlantic—these and other questions have lately taken up a large part of current discussion. Perhaps the greatest actual benefit to the cause of aviation comes from just this incitement of popular interest. That the airplane is useful for other things than war and sport is shown by the year's report of the New York and Washington air mail service just issued. In the year it has carried 7,720,840 letters between the two cities.

Naturally, Americans have watched with most attention the progress of, our own gigantic seaplanes. Two of them have made two "legs" of their route (Rockaway Beach - Halifax - Newfoundland - Azores - Portugal), and, as we write, may start for the Azores any minute or may await their comrade, the NC-4, which illustrated the comparative security of the seaplane over the airplane by driving, partly under her own power, over a long expanse of sea surface into the port of Chatham, Massachusetts, after mishaps in the air had interrupted her flight. These seaplanes, owned and manned by our Navy, are not competing for the money prize and are not taking foolishly reckless risks; for their route is watched by American war vessels; they are quite capable of sustaining themselves for a long time in the water; and they have each four Liberty engines. Each carried 25,000 pounds weight in the flight from Rockaway to Halifax, and it is planned to increase this to 28,000 on the actual ocean flight.

At the other extreme as to type are the two British airplanes which have been waiting several weeks in Newfoundland for favorable weather. Their proposed dash across the whole Atlantic is daring in the extreme, not because of the distance, but because of the always considerable danger of engine trouble, the impossibility of making repairs, and the slight chance of safety if a descent in mid-ocean is necessary. On the other hand, the airplane is much speedier than the seaplane; it might make the voyage in less than a day; thus the danger from sudden weather change is less. The layman is, on the whole, inclined to say that success by an airplane would prove nothing new and is inexcusably dangerous, while that of the seaplane would be a demonstration of the right way to cope with air problems and a triumph of wise planning and thorough preparation. The seaplane is an American achievement both as to invention and development.

CONSUMERS IN CO-OPERATION

Every one knows of the successful and extensive associations in England under which wholesale and retail distribution of goods is carried on by co-operative societies. Few know how much has been done in this direction in the United States. We are not particularly surprised when we are told that the British co-operative societies now do a business of about a billion dollars a year and save their members about one hundred million dollars. But we are surprised when we read that there are now not far from twenty-five hundred consumers' co-operative associations in the United States.

This fact, and others equally interesting, we find stated in a well-informed and encouraging editorial in the New York "Evening Post." The number of such societies in this country has been multiplied by three within the last two years, and it is not improbable, one surmises, that this growth may be due to the pressure of high prices, which has driven people to combine against them. The associations which have come into prominence lately are largely among the industrial centers, and they have been encouraged by organized labor. The article to which we have referred states, for instance, that the Illinois miners have sixty-five such societies, doing a yearly business of about four million dollars, and entirely managed by workingmen. In Seattle the expansion of co-operation has been remarkable. It started in a strike of butchers, which led consumers to establish a shop of their own, which later took over the city market, and now, it is reported, does a monthly business in meat of seventy thousand dollars and has its own slaughterhouse. Many other co-operative shops managed by consumers for themselves are to be found in Seattle. In California the movement has made great progress, and a "Union of Producers and Consumers" has been formed which combines many of the local enterprises. Last year a National convention of co-operative enterprises was held in Springfield, Illinois, and it is thought that a National wholesale enterprise will be the result.

It would not be at all astonishing (in view of what has been done in Great Britain, and in view of the fact that in Russia ten thousand co-operative societies existed in 1914 and that the number has since largely increased) if one method of relief from economic distress and the evil of excessive profits for middlemen may ultimately be found in just this direction of intelligent, mutual business helpfulness of consumers by consumers and for consumers.

THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH CONGRESS

The Episcopal Church Congress, which held its sessions in New York early this month, was notable for the topics selected for consideration and for the frank and fearless way in which the subjects were handled by the clerical and lay writers. The need for an American Labor party was strongly argued by the Rev. Percy Grant and Mrs. Vladimir G. Simkhovitch, head of the Greenwich House. New York, who agreed that there was no hope for labor in either of the existing political parties, and contended that the formation of a Labor party is the only security against revolutionary Socialism. The opposite view was forcefully presented in a most able paper written by Mr. B. Preston Clark, of Boston, who asserted that such a step would emphasize class distinctions and inevitably invite a counter-organization of capital.

On the obligation of the Church to support a League of Nations a sharp difference of opinion revealed itself. The Rev. Dr. Roland Cotton Smith, rector of the historic St. John's Church, Washington, D. C., took the unpopular view and stoutly denied any such obligation.

Next to these topics the subject which attracted most attention was the Effect of War on Religion, which was introduced by a brilliant paper written by the Rev. Dr. William Austin Smith, editor of the "Churchman," who said that the war had forced organized religion to define its enthusiasms and revealed the fact that many of its enthusiasms are not edifying.

On purely Church matters the mind of the Congress was manifestly in favor of a radical change in the seminary training of candidates for the ministry, putting the emphasis not so much on theology as on the application of religion to life. Under the head of Essentials of Prayer-Book Revision, the need for modernizing the Prayer-Book was strongly urged and greater flexibility in its use advocated. Bishop Johnson closed the sessions with a forceful and amazingly frank paper on "The Place of the Episcopate in a Demo-

The Church Congress is usually regarded as the prelude to the General Convention, and in its choice of subjects and its bold treatment of modern social and religious problems it raises the hope that the General Convention, which meets at Detroit in October, will rise to the height of real leadership.

CANADA'S RAILWAY PROBLEMS

Partly as a result of the war, Canada has a railway problem of her own which in some respects bears a strong resemblance to that of the United States. It would be idle to conjecture whether or not a majority of Canadians favor in the abstract the principle of public ownership of railways. Apparently Canada has no choice in the matter. Whether she likes it or not, the Dominion is committed by necessity to the public ownership and operation of more than twenty-two thousand miles of railway, comprising two transcontinental systems with numerous and extensive branch lines. The ownership and operation of this big railway mileage entail also the ownership and operation of two commercial telegraph systems and a chain of high-class hotels.

Canada did not follow the example of Great Britain and the United States in taking over the operation of the railways during the war. Instead, she appointed in October, 1917, the Canadian Railway War Board, a body which co-ordinated the efforts of the various railways while still leaving them under their private management. The system worked well, the efficiency of Canadian railways being the admiration of the rest of the American continent during a trying period. The Canadian Pacific, the biggest and strongest of Canadian railways, was able without special difficulty to overcome all the financial obstacles of the war period; but the way was far from smooth for the newer roads—the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific. Wage increases granted on American railways by Mr. McAdoo led to similar demands in Canada which could not be denied. Increased freight and passenger rates were sanctioned by the Canadian Railway Commission to compensate for increased operating costs; but apparently no practicable increase could save the situation for the newer and weaker roads. It is doubtful if they could have survived even if there had been no wage increases.

Both roads were built almost wholly on public credit, their bonds having been lavishly guaranteed by the Dominion Government and several of the provincial governments during a long period of optimism and prosperity preceding the war. The plain truth seems to be that there was much unnecessary building in advance of requirements and much unnecessary and wasteful duplication of lines not only across the wide stretch of territory, as yet unproductive, which separates eastern from western Canada, but on the western prairies as well.

In the spring of 1914 the Canadian Northern was given a heavy guarantee of bonds by the Dominion Government. Sir Robert Borden made it a condition of the grant that the Government should receive forty per cent of the common stock in return for this guarantee of credit, while fifteen per cent was to be held in escrow to revert to the Government in the event of this financial assistance not proving sufficient. The outbreak of war made it impossible to market these bonds to advantage, and, after a long struggle, the Canadian Northern management gave up the task, surrendering the entire ownership of the road to the Canadian Government. A few weeks ago the Grand Trunk Pacific advised the Government that it could no longer pay its fixed charges, and the ownership of this road also has reverted to the Government.

In addition to these two lines, Canada already owned the National Transcontinental, built by the Laurier Government, to connect with the Grand Trunk Pacific at Winnipeg and link it with the Atlantic seaboard; and the Intercolonial, built shortly after confederation, to link the Province of Quebec with Halifax. All of these roads have now been consolidated into one system, to be operated by the Government through a commission.

THE TREATY OF VERSAILLES

IF the object of the victors' terms of peace is to humiliate the enemy, the terms of the treaty, outlined elsewhere in this issue, drawn up by the Peace Conference at Paris and presented at Versailles, certainly fulfill their purpose.

Only a year ago the German dream of world domination was coming perilously near fulfillment as the field-gray battalions crashed through the British and French lines and the German cannon roared out their mockery of the efforts of America. World Domination was what the leaders of the mighty German Empire gambled for. They knew, and said, that if they lost the alternative would be Downfall. They lost, and Downfall it is. Though even now, with their navy ingloriously surrendered and with their territory occupied by the victors' troops, the German leaders desperately seek to find some other outcome, even though they may secure some modification of the terms placed before them on the Lusitania anniversary, that word Downfall, written on every page and into every phrase of the treaty which they will have to sign, will sear their eyes and burn itself into their brains.

If the object of the victors' terms of peace is to record in history the terrible lesson that vaulting ambition may overleap itself and that cynical contempt of the moral convictions of mankind may bring down on the offender the world's wrath, this treaty fulfills its purpose. The requirements embodied in it are such as only an outraged community could impose upon a criminal. The very signatures are eloquent, for on one side will be recorded the names of twenty-seven nations, speaking for the conscience of the world, while on the other side will stand alone the name of the offender, Germany.

But if the object of the victors' terms of peace is something more; if it is to provide security for the future and to bring the mind of the offender to a consciousness of guilt, it is not yet certain that the treaty presented to the Germans at Versailles will fulfill its purpose.

SECURITY FOR THE FUTURE

When a criminal is arrested, convicted, and sentenced, in order to insure the safety of the community from his further depredations two things are necessary:

- (1) The assuring of the strength of the captors.
- (2) The weakening of the criminal.

(1) For assuring the strength of the captors of Germany the chief provision is the League of Nations. We have recorded our belief in the need of such an organization of the nations of the world, and we hardly need to reaffirm our belief here. There could be little hope of future security unless the nations provided some means for acting together in order to preserve the peace of the world as they have acted together in restoring it.

But of itself a League of Nations will do nothing. Its efficacy depends upon the strength of its position and its resources, and upon the unity of its spirit. What about the strength of the position of this League and of its resources? Marshal Foch is without doubt the greatest authority in the world as to this point, and it is rather alarmingly reported that he is not satisfied with the provisions made for the strength either of the League's position or of its resources. Other reports represent him as being ready to acquiesce in the arrangements made for temporary guarantees from Great Britain and the United States to France. We cannot afford to depend upon reports pro and con. The people of the United States and those of the associated nations ought to be sure on this point. Are the sentries around the prisoner's place of confinement well placed, and are their arms going to be sufficient and quickly available? This is not a question of this year or this decade. It is a question to be settled now for many years to come. The prison walls are to be the military frontiers of France; and the sentries stationed nearest to the prisoner's possible place of exit are to be the French people. It is France that most needs protection, and it is the French who have had the bitterest experience of the crimes for which the prisoner is restrained. We in America can afford to be careless, indifferent, unconcerned, and rather superior to dread of possible danger if we are going to consider only our own safety; but if we are to be actuated by a sense of obligation to those who have saved us from the desolating touch of war on our own land, if we are to take counsel of those who know more of the inferno which the Boche has brought upon the earth than we do, we must not be indifferent, careless, or condescending. We must make sure that the provisions for safeguarding the world ten, twenty, thirty, fifty years from now are not so defective that some day our children, or our children's children, will condemn us for our blindness and our callousness to the warnings which the Germans' closest neighbors have given us.

The League of Nations is an experiment, one which millions are anxiously hoping will prove successful. All the more is it necessary to see that nothing is left undone which will save that experiment from failure when the test comes. The efficacy of a League of Nations, moreover, will depend not merely upon its resources in men and material, but even more upon the unity of spirit among its members. Has the process by which this treaty has been evolved created that spirit of unity? Do the terms of the treaty tend to preserve that spirit of unity? There is need for assurance on this point. Certainly when we read of demonstrations in Rome against President Wilson and in Tokyo against Americans; when we receive despatches reporting the complaints in Italian papers against America's interference in the Adriatic, in Japanese papers against America's interference in the Orient, in British papers against America's interference in Ireland, in French papers against America's interference in the arrangements for the Saar Valley, whether the complaints are just or not, it is a time for Americans to examine with care the document that has led to these displays of unfriendliness on the part of our friends and to see whether there are in that Treaty elements of disunity and antagonisms. If there are, we must see that those elements are eliminated, for there is no hope of international co-operation, no matter how elaborate the machinery may be, if there is not the force of a common sentiment and a common purpose and mutual confidence to make it operative.

(2) Has the weakening of the offender been adequately secured? For the time being, yes. There is no well-founded fear that he will break his bonds in the immediate future. But his potential strength is far from being impaired.

In order to understand what our task is in the making of peace we must keep fresh in our memory what Prussia has done in the making of war.

From the fifteenth century, when the dominions of the Hohenzollerns consisted of a small territory surrounding Berlin, Prussia has been a menace to the liberty of Europe. It was Napoleon who said, we believe, that Prussia was hatched from a cannon ball. Bit by bit, through the use of the mailed fist, Prussia conquered and subdued her neighbors, till she became the most powerful, though the least civil or civilized, of the German states; then she proceeded, by a policy carried out relentlessly by Bismarck, to dominate the rest of what we now call Germany. The Bavarians and Saxons and other German tribes disliked the Prussians, but feared them, found their military might a bringer of prestige, and succumbed to them. First awed by the chief plotters against the peace and liberty of Europe, these other states finally joined in the plot.

When the war of 1914 broke out, the conspirators were ready to put their plan through. They have been thwarted; some of their leaders have been discredited and overthrown; but the states and peoples who joined themselves together in the conspiracy still remain together. They number nearly seventy million, and hope to add to their group the Germans of Austria.

When a body of citizens unite for their own welfare or for some public good, we encourage the association; but when men unite to murder and rob their fellow-citizens, and together burn, rape, destroy, devastate, we call their union a criminal conspiracy, and try to break it up. We do not encourage them as we encouraged the orderly organizations of good citizens. If we have any intelligence and power, we break up the conspiracy, separate the conspirators, and treat each one in the gang according to the measure of his guilt.

What has made Germany a world menace has been the power of Prussia first to dominate materially the other German states, and then to dominate them mentally. An obviously intelligent policy toward Germany, strongly advocated during the war as well as since the armistice by men acquainted with European history, would have been to weaken the hold of Prussia upon the rest of Germany; to loosen the bonds between Prussia and her German neighbors; to encourage Bavaria, and Saxony, and Württemberg, and Baden, and the rest, to revert to what was once their spirit of independence and inoffensive peaceableness. Instead, there is every indication that Germany, during the period of the armistice, has been slowly but surely solidifying. While the war was in full blast, during one of the German retreats a Bavarian officer was captured. He was asked, "Are you Bavarians not sorry now that you lent yourselves to Prussia?" And his answer came promptly: "Before the war we didn't like the Prussians; but now we see that our fault was that we were not Prussians enough." What is there in the Peace Treaty that discourages that view? The Allied and Associated nations, as they are meticulously called, have failed to show any far-sighted policy toward Germany in the making of peace. Whatever policy can be discerned from watching the outcome of the Peace Conference has been that of trying to make Germany a strong nation—strong enough to provide a common government to negotiate with, strong enough to make it comparatively simple to collect money and goods in reparation; and thus, for the sake of simplifying negotiations and collecting as much of the debt as possible, the Peace Conference has been promoting the unity, and to that extent the further Prussianization, of Germany. There can be no other way of German unity except by Prussianization, for three-fifths of the Germans are Prussian. The only way to stop Prussianization is to discourage German unity, and that has not been done.

A policy toward Germany is one thing; means for putting that policy into effect is another thing. If it is asked what means could be employed to break down the artificial unity of the German Empire, it could be replied that the Allies might have said to the Germans: "With the abdication and flight of your Emperor your Empire is gone. It was his dynasty and his Potsdam gang alone that held you together. We are going to deal first with Prussia, and we shall then take the rest of you in your turn. It is Prussia—away back in the Brandenburg era—that started this thing, and it is Prussia that we are going to hold as the head of the age-long conspiracy which has resulted in this war." That is one means that conceivably might have been used. Other means could have been devised by the men of ingenuity and resource who are in the service of the Allied Governments.

But the means is incidental. The chief thing is the policy. If we had had a definite policy of encouraging the natural diversity among the German states, we should have had a divided and weakened Germany to deal with. We could have made some distinctions in raising the blockade here and holding it down there; we could have apportioned the retribution somewhere according to the measure of guilt. But that is past. We did not. Let us see that we do not lend ourselves in the future to any policy that would confirm the domination of Prussia over Germany or would promote any German unity sustained by the Prussian spirit, leading to a new effort by Germany under Prussian leadership to dominate the world.

THE CONSCIOUSNESS OF GUILT

But there is still another object of the victor's terms of peace. That is to bring about a change in the mind of the offender. Is there any change yet discernible in the German mind? We see none. This is what Count Brockdorff-Rantzau, head of the German plenipotentiaries at Versailles, said in his address to the men representing the victorious nations:

It is demanded from us that we shall confess ourselves to be the only ones guilty of the war. Such a confession in my mouth would be a lie. . . . We energetically deny that Germany and its people, who were convinced that they were making a war of defense, were alone guilty.

It is true that he acknowledged Germany's wrong in invading Belgium, but in that he goes no further than Bethmann Hollweg himself, who, at the outbreak of the war, acknowledged the invasion to be a wrong for which Germany would pay in money. The very form of the confession was such as to show how impossible it is for the Germans to acknowledge the heinousness of their act, as if money could wipe out the stain. And so far from acknowledging any special guilt on Germany's part, Brockdorff-Rantzau actually presumes to suggest that some neutral Power or Powers be selected to judge between Germany and her judges. This spirit of impenitence is recorded in the less official, but equally typically German, utterances of Erzberger.

In answering the question of a representative of the New York "Globe" and the Chicago "Daily News," Herr Erzberger denied emphatically that the present German Government assumed any moral guilt for starting the war or for inaugurating the submarine warfare, and he added: "We see now that we made a military error. We should not have used the U-boat unless we used five thousand U-boats instead of a few hundred." And when the representative asked him, "Then Germany does recognize the fact that in some way she lost the war?" he replied: "It was not a military defeat, but a defeat brought on by hunger. The German armies were not beaten. The German people were not defeated."

And the Germans themselves as a people have not moved perceptibly toward acknowledgment of their guilt. On the contrary, a man who like Kurt Eisner acknowledged the guilt of the German people in this war they killed.

Until the Germans are repentant there is no trusting them. To feel secure because they are for the time being rendered powerless is to live in a fool's paradise. With Austria there will be eighty million Germans in Central Europe—eighty millions who are sorry, not that they devastated northern France and raped and burned and wrought havoc that surpasses in savagery all that savages ever did, but sorry only that they did not succeed, that they did not burn and rape enough; not that they had many scores of U-boats, but that they did not have five thousand; not that they used poison gas, but that they failed to make it poisonous enough. You cannot make such people sorry by encouraging them to be a strong democracy, or by encouraging them to revive their industries that we may trade with them or collect money from their profits. When the Germans were encouraged to believe that they could make a peace by negotiation on the basis of the Fourteen Points, they were discouraged from becoming aware of their position as criminals who are not in position to negotiate. When they were allowed to surrender before they acknowledged military defeat, they were permitted to remain in the opinion that they could wipe out their guilt by giving lip service to a set of abstract doctrines. It is perhaps not too late to repair in part those errors. We can at least give the Germans a chance to be ready to acknowledge the evil that they have done by enabling them to see the evil. If the Peace Treaty, or the League of Nations, were to require every German youth to spend the two years heretofore required for military service in actual labor for the rehabilitation of France and Belgium on the spot, the coming generation of Germans would not forget what their elders had wrought and would come to hate the deeds which entailed the misery and waste they were set to repair. As the Passover Feast was a memorial for the Jews, so the duty of repairing the wrong that their fathers had wrought would become a memorial to them, reminding them of the retribution that follows such a crime against humanity. It would not be economic. Labor of that sort is not efficient; but Germany has taught us—at least we ought to have learned from her—that efficiency is not all. There is a moral gain that ought to be wrought by the Peace of Versailles which will mean far more for the future happiness of the world than can be measured in German marks or secured by German bonds.

AMERICA'S PART IN THE PEACE

The Treaty presented at Versailles on May 7 was drafted in secret. Open covenants cannot always be "openly arrived at." But if this covenant is to be really open, it must now be laid open to public discussion and subjected to any revision that free peoples see are needed. The obligation, in particular, rests upon the American Senate to scrutinize this treaty and demand changes, if changes are required, for the welfare of America and the world. America is not in the position of Germany—of being required to take it or leave it. Above all, America cannot afford merely to praise God that some kind of treaty is drafted, and then turn away to her business and pleasure.

For a journal to pass in review, within a week, the result of a Peace Conference that has involved the labors of hundreds of men for three months or more, and to do that on the basis of a summary of the Treaty and not the text itself, which is as yet unavailable, would be the height of presumption. We do not need, therefore, to say that it has been our purpose here, not to point out defects in the Treaty or to pass judgment upon it, but to suggest that the Treaty should be examined in the light of its objects. The war was a war of peoples. The peace will be a peoples' peace only as the people keep in mind the object of the Treaty and understand the general effect of its terms.

When the text is published, we most earnestly hope that it will prove worthy of ratification by the United States Senate. It necessarily involves compromises, and compromises are never wholly satisfactory. The Treaty, therefore, is not likely to satisfy everybody. To reject the Treaty would be to incur the gravest responsibility. It may be desirable to propose amendments, but to propose amendments which would require reconsideration by the Peace Conference might involve delay. Although delay now would be better than disaster twenty years from now and every effort should be directed to preventing such future disaster, it would not be the part of wisdom to incur present danger unless the alternative of disaster is very clear.

The Senate of the United States, however, can accompany any action it takes upon the Treaty with a declaration interpreting its action. We should like to see the Senate formally declare in acting upon the Treaty that, while the Government of the United States proposes to fulfill to the uttermost its obligations, and will seek in every way to retain and cultivate friendship with friendly nations, especially those which have been its comrades in war, it will not relax its vigilance or its effort to make and keep the Nation strong.

Only by bearing their part in making the peace will the American people show themselves worthy of the victory that has been won.

THE SIXTY-SIXTH CONGRESS

REASSEMBLING on May 19 in accordance with the call issued by President Wilson from Paris, Congress faces a task as difficult as any which confronted it during the period of the war.

Its duty will be twofold. On the one hand, Congress will have to bear its share of responsibility in the re-establishment of international peace; and, on the other hand, it will have to institute measures of domestic reconstruction.

In the making of peace naturally the Senate will have the foremost place, since the Senate is the treaty-making branch of Congress; but the House of Representatives may be involved, for in the League of Nations, as well as in the special arrangement which the President proposes America should enter into with Great Britain and France for the future security of Europe, the war-making powers of Congress may become involved, and in those powers the House of Representatives has its share.

Not less important than the duty of passing upon the Peace Treaty and the League of Nations is the duty of Congress to provide measures for making the Nation as strong, efficient, and free as possible, that it may take its place with honor in a new and, we hope, better world order. America is one of the countries freest from the dangers that threaten the peoples of Russia and Central Europe. Nevertheless, restlessness and something of the spirit of adventure everywhere must follow such an experience as that of this war. The people of this country, like other peoples, have found new sources of strength within themselves. They have new ambitions. They see new possibilities. The first duty of Congress is to exercise its imagination. The hope for the future lies with those men who can see with their minds that which does not yet exist and can draw their plans to meet what they see.

There are pressing and immediate duties that are obvious. First, of course, is action upon the appropriation bills, involving more than four billions of dollars, which failed of passage when the Sixty-fifth Congress came to an end. The failure of these appropriation bills created a condition that was practically unprecedented, for the Government faced the coming year with no money specifically authorized for the use of certain great departments. The special session to which the President has now called the Sixty-sixth Congress has been necessitated by the requirements of the Government for the money which cannot be used until Congress authorizes its use. Other measures introduced in the last Congress, but unenacted, require action now. Among the subjects requiring prompt attention are: the so-called reconstruction legislation, the determination of the railway policy of the country, the decision as to what to do with our newly created merchant marine, the question of immigration, the problem of unemployment, particularly with reference to the rights and needs of our returning soldiers, child labor, the application and enforcement of the newly adopted Prohibition Amendment, and, not least important, the old but ever-present need for the adoption of a proper financial system, including a budget.

The new Congress will be controlled in both houses by the Republicans. For eight years the Democratic party has controlled the House of Representatives, and for six of those years the Senate. On the principle of not swapping horses when crossing a stream the country kept the Democratic party in power, although far from satisfied with its management of certain vital questions in the war; but even before the country had safely and surely crossed the stream of war the horses were swapped. The Republican party comes into power, but also into grave responsibility. It is no time for party politics; it is no time for maneuvering for future position. It is a time when men must, as never before, act on the principle that he serves his party best who serves his country best. It is a time when Congress must exercise, not only its imagination, but its patriotism.

CHICAGO AND CITY PLANNING

IT is said that an enthusiastic Chicagoan some years ago, while making a business trip on the other side of the Atlantic, met a distinguished European archaeologist and invited him to visit Chicago. Said the American: "You ought to see Chicago. It is only fifty years old and has three million inhabitants." The archaeologist replied: "That does not interest me in the slightest. I would prefer rather to see a city three million years old with only fifty inhabitants." It is not unfair to say that a quarter of a century ago, when the World's Fair of '93, the most beautiful architectural exposition of modern times, was being planned, the ideals of Chicago were Youth, Energy, Bigness. The World's Fair, with its wonderful Court of Honor and its still more beautiful lagoon, started the thoughts of Chicago on another track, and its ideal may be said to-day to be Maturity, Efficiency, Beauty. Up to 1893 Chicagoans, like most Americans, assumed that cities, like Topsy, just grew, that creative intelligence has little or nothing to do with their development, that all you have to do is to attract a big population by holding out the opportunity of making money. Let them work feverishly, and in a haphazard fashion build houses, stores, factories, stockyards, and railway terminals, and the job is accomplished.

There is, however, one great advantage in energy and youth. They enable their possessor to catch the vision of new ideals and vigorously to set to work embodying them in practical results.

Chicago possessed this advantage. Having been one of the ugliest and richest cities in the country, it is now rapidly becoming one of the most beautiful and intelligent. Its conversion, which cannot fail to have its effect on other cities of the country, is either the cause or the effect, it is hard to tell which, of the city-planning movement. These reflections are suggested by a book, "What of the City?" published by A. C. McClurg & Co., of Chicago, which has just come to our table. The author is Mr. Walter D. Moody, Managing Director of the Chicago Plan Commission. Mr. Moody defines city planning as follows:

City planning in America is not a mysterious something built up slowly in the minds of a limited group of architects with city-planning aspirations. It is the simplest and most elementary proposition in the world. The planning of a city means making it what we would make our individual homes—a thing of order, of convenience, and of attractiveness. The quickest way to bring this about is to get the people truly to regard their city as their larger home.

The volume from which this sensible extract is taken is a history of the city-planning movement and its accomplishments in Chicago. Not the least interesting thing about the volume is the fact that it is profusely illustrated. Before-and-after pictures are shown, pictures of the ugly and of the lovely side of Chicago, pictures of designs that it is proposed to carry out in future and pictures of beautiful spots and arrangements in foreign cities. The book is not technical. It is human and anecdotal. We hope its reading will not be wholly confined to the city of Chicago.

To this sincerely felt tribute to the new and fine spirit of Chicago we cannot resist adding the observation that no one need be anxious lest all these fine new works and aspirations are going to take away that big-heartedness, genuineness, and naturalness which made the people of Chicago very likable even in the days when the physical aspect of the city was something of a horror to the eye.

That Chicago has not altogether lost her love of size and quantity, a thing that probably accounts for the fact that she has always been big-hearted, is indicated by a picture in the volume portraying one of the new constructions in Chicago's fine city plan. The picture is entitled "The New Field Museum of Natural History, the largest marble building in the world, fronting on Grant Park." It is rather engaging than otherwise to find that Chicago still looks even at marble buildings in a large way. The worst enemy of real æsthetic advance is smallness of view and affectation of manner.

Go to it, Chicago. In this work of city planning you are not only helping yourself, you are helping the country. Continue to have big visions and carry them out in a big way, and help some of us, who are in danger of becoming fatigued and blasé, to remember that breeziness is one of the qualities of natural beauty.

MAKING TEACHING EFFICIENT AND PATRIOTIC

A GROUP of bills relating to education were passed by the New York Legislature which recently adjourned, and are awaiting action by the Governor as we write. They deal with conditions which are not confined to New York State or to New York City. Taken together, they aim to secure adequate pay to teachers, to promote Americanization in education, and to further the compulsory continuation school plan.

Most people, we imagine, would be decidedly surprised if they were told that New York State is surpassed in the total amount of its appropriation for school purposes by four other States and that it is thirty-ninth in the list of States as regards the ratio of the amount of its appropriations to the actual wealth of the State. These figures are given on high educational authority, and they certainly indicate that New York is not overpaying its teachers or spending too much money in educational work. As in all other States, the educational situation in New York has suffered because of the absence of teachers in war work and the attractions of much higher pay in other vocations. Yet many thousands of teachers have, through love of their profession, kept on with their work, and in most such cases there was no lack of patriotism in this adherence to the very high duty of the teacher's field of work.

The possibility of securing the best educational material for the future must depend largely upon adequacy of pay. One of the bills to which we have referred proposes that the State should fix minimum salaries for all the cities of the State, as it may now by law for New York City. A sub-committee on teachers' salaries reported to the New York Senate that there is a serious shortage of teachers, that this is due to the larger salaries paid in other vocations, and that there is a growing unrest in the teaching force. One result is that the committee found in the elementary schools in New York City more than thirty thousand children for whom there were class-rooms but no teachers. Other cities show equally deplorable conditions. Dr. Claxton, the United States Commissioner of Education, recently said:

Teachers are now paid less for their work than any other class of workers, and the increase in their pay in the last few years has in no wise been in keeping with the increase of pay of other workers or with the increases in the cost of living.

While the cost of living has increased approximately eighty per cent, salaries of teachers have increased only about twelve per cent. Many of the better teachers are leaving the schools and their places are taken by men and women of less native ability, less education and culture, and less training and experience. Many of these places are not filled at all.

As an inevitable result, the character of the schools is being lowered just at a time when it ought to be raised to a much higher standard. The only remedy is larger pay for teachers.

The proposal that teachers' salaries throughout the State should be increased by an aggregate amount of five million dollars is, under these circumstances, moderate and reasonable.

Equally important is the effort to extend the work of night schools, community schools, factory schools, and other local efforts to Americanize foreign-born citizens. Fine work has been done in this direction already, very largely by volunteer effort. The second bill in the group passed by the Legislature authorizes the Commissioner of Education to divide the State into zones and to appoint directors and teachers to carry on the work of promoting educational facilities for illiterates and non-English-speaking persons. It carries with it also a provision by which the local authorities and school trustees may make appropriations to carry out this plan.

The system of continuation or compulsory part-time schools is based on the fundamentally democratic principle that the State should provide facilities for the education of every child. Now, as many children of fourteen, fifteen, or sixteen years of age become wage-earners because of their home conditions, a very large number of them grow up to be men and women with an extremely incomplete training. The general plan affords an opportunity of part-time instruction for such young people under courses approved by the Commissioner of Education, including instruction in the rights and obligations of citizenship, American history, and industrial matters. The third of the bills referred to provides a practical plan for this continuation work, both in large and small communities, and requires the attendance of children between the ages of fourteen and eighteen at such schools when they are not receiving education otherwise.

If these efforts to widen and better the educational system of New York become law, as there is reason to hope, they will provide an example and model to other States of the new plans upon which the best educators are moving to make education reach all those to whom it is due as a right, and to instruct them not merely in ordinary school knowledge, but in citizenship and patriotism.

HOW WAR PROHIBITION WILL BE ENFORCED VIOLATORS FACE PENALTIES UNDER THE WAR PROHIBITION ACT AND LIQUOR TAX LAWS

THE newspapers are seesawing between statements that war prohibition can and cannot be enforced. One day they state that if Congress does not meet and pass enforcement legislation the Act will be a farce. The next day they claim that thousands of spies and revenue officers will be appointed to force the country into bone-dryness after July 1.

As a matter of fact, friends of the War Prohibition Act believe that Congress will be called in session in time to enact an adequate law enforcement code with up-to-date law enforcement provisions. Congress will doubtless be in session before July 1. If the liquor interests carry out their threat to violate the law, their defiance will probably result in a more complete law enforcement code than might otherwise be adopted.

ENFORCEMENT UNDER EXISTING LAWS

The present power to enforce the War Prohibition Act, while not entirely adequate, is nevertheless fairly effective. Liquor dealers who violate the War Prohibition Act will face not only the criminal nal penalties of war prohibition, but all the penalties under the liquor tax laws.

The Federal Government requires every person who makes or sells alcoholic liquors with an alcoholic content of one-half of one per cent or more to pay the liquor revenue tax as a retail liquor dealer. (Section 5,573, Barnes's Federal Code.)

This tax receipt granted by the United States does not give to its holder the right to carry on his business in violation of the law. The courts have taken the position that a business which is prohibited by law may be taxed, and that the imposition of a tax on an outlawed business is sometimes more efficient in suppressing it than statutes making it a criminal offense, because of the larger certainty of the collection of the tax. This principle was upheld in the following cases: 120 Tenn. 470; 32 Mich. 486. Judge Cooley, in his work on taxation, said:

One purpose of taxation sometimes is to discourage the business and perhaps put it out of existence.

The United States Supreme Court, in discussing this with reference to collecting the tax in a State where the traffic was prohibited, said (5 Wall. 462):

What the latter prohibits, the former, if the business is found existing notwithstanding the prohibition, discourages by taxation.

The two lines of legislation proceed in the same direction and tend to the same result. At this time the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has taken the position that he will not sell stamps to liquor dealers who propose to engage in the traffic after the War Prohibition Act goes into effect. This does not prevent, however, every liquor dealer who does sell in violation of law from being liable for the tax. The tax is laid on the traffic wherever it exists, be it legal or illegal. Section 3,243 of the Federal Statutes specifically provides that the holding of the Federal tax itself gives no protection from prosecution under the criminal laws.

If a liquor dealer manufactures intoxicating liquor or sells it or removes it without a liquor stamp or with a false stamp, he may be imprisoned for a year, with a money fine in addition. Removal for storage without stamps is also penalized, as well as the failure to make a true entry report of liquors manufactured. (See Sections 3,340-4, Federal Statutes.)

Persons running moonshine stills may be arrested by any marshal or deputy marshal and taken before a judicial officer for trial. This is provided in the Act of March 1, 1879.

The penalty for selling liquor without the payment of the tax (found in Section 5,141, Barnes's Federal Code) is $1,000 to $5,000 and imprisonment from six months to two years. The War Prohibition Act itself carries a penalty of imprisonment not to exceed one year and a penalty of $1,000, or both. We know that these penalties are provided by the law, but the next question is, "Who is authorized and obligated to enforce them?"

DUTY OF OFFICERS TO ENFORCE CRIMINAL ACTS

We have only to study the Revised Statutes to find that both State and Federal officers are authorized to arrest persons who violate Federal laws. Section 1,014 of the Revised Statutes reads as follows:

For any crime or offense against the United States, the offender may, by any justice or judge of the United States, or by any commissioner of a circuit court to take bail, or by any chancellor, judge of a supreme or superior court, chief or first judge of common pleas, mayor of a city, justice of the peace, or other magistrate, of any State where he may be found, and agreeable to the usual mode of process against offenders in such State, and at the expense of the United States, be arrested and imprisoned, or bailed, as the case may be, for trial before such court of the United States as by law has cognizance of the offense.

It is easy to follow the process by which the law can deal with the possible violator of the War Prohibition Act from the time he is arrested by the marshal and taken to the nearest hearing until he is sentenced and fined. To do this we have only to study our Federal Code.

The District Attorney is bound to prosecute in his district all delinquents for crimes and offenses cognizable under the authority of the United States, and all civil actions in which the United States is concerned (R. S. 771). Therefore it will become his duty to prosecute violators of the War Prohibition Act.

It is the duty of marshals to appoint deputy marshals and to command all necessary assistance in the execution of their duty. Here (R. S. 787) we have ample authority for officers of the law securing all the assistants they need to enforce war prohibition. Section 1,111 states that marshals shall have in each State the same powers as sheriffs in executing the laws of the United States (R. S. 785).

This brings us to the Attorney-General, who may assign any officer of the Department of Justice to take charge of the prosecution of these cases.

An important point is established by Section 414 (Barnes's Federal Code) which states that the Attorney-General, or any officer of the Department of Justice, or any attorney or counselor specially appointed by the Attorney-General under any provisions of law, may, when thereunto specifically directed by the Attorney-General, conduct any kind of legal proceedings, civil or criminal, including grand jury proceedings before committing magistrates, which district attorneys now are or hereafter may be by law authorized to conduct, whether or not he or they be residents of the district in which such proceeding is brought (Act June 30, 1906, c. 3,935, 34 Stat. 816).

Having seen that marshals, assistant marshals, district attorneys, the Attorney-General and counselors appointed by him are responsible for bringing the law violator to justice, we now come to a consideration of the power of the Court.

OFFICERS AUTHORIZED TO HOLD TO SECURITY OF PEACE AND FOR GOOD BEHAVIOR

Section 270 of the Judicial Code (5 Fed. Stats. Ann., 2d Ed., p. 2056) provides as follows:

The judges of the Supreme Court and of the circuit court of appeals and district courts, United States commissioners, and the judges and other magistrates of the several States who are or may be authorized by law to make arrests for offenses against the United States, shall have the like authority to hold to security of the peace and for good behavior in cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, as may be lawfully exercised by any judge or justice of the peace of the respective States, in cases cognizable before them. (36 Stats., 1,163; 5 Fed. Stats. Ann., 2d Ed., p. 1056; 2 U. S. Comp. Stats., 1916, Sec. 1,247.)

If the more serious threats of the liquor dealers are carried out, this section may be invoked.

Liquor dealers will not have an easy road to travel in violating the Prohibition Law, even under war prohibition. It is expected that the permanent prohibition code, to be enacted by Congress, will furnish a 1920 model of efficiency and speed for enforcing the Eighteenth Amendment. The last decision of the Supreme Court gives little comfort to those who are hoarding large quantities of liquor.

The construction placed upon the laws relating to the liquor tax is even more strict. The United States Circuit Court of Appeals of the Fourth Circuit recently construed the Federal Statutes relating to the liquor tax in the case of the United States vs. one Saxon automobile carrying liquor. The evidence showed that the owner of the automobile knew nothing of the illegal transaction. The Court said:

It seems to us the statute requiring the forfeiture is explicit, leaving no room for construction. . . . There is no limitation nor exception that the forfeiture shall depend upon proof of fraud in the owner of the conveyance, or on any other condition.

The Court in this case overruled its former decision and cited in support of its conclusion United States vs. Stowell, 133 U. S. 1.

The court decisions and statutes are not holding out any encouragement to Liquor Law violators. A large force of officers connected with the Internal Revenue Department are available so far as the illegal manufacture and sale of liquor is concerned in relation to the Tax Law. The Justice Department has an efficient force of assistants who can be used to enforce the criminal laws. In the olden days it was said that "one shall chase a thousand and two shall put ten thousand to flight." One Federal officer backed by the United States Government will put a thousand bootleggers and moonshiners to flight after the National Prohibition Law goes into operation. Every officer of the law by his oath of office is obliged to sustain the Constitution and laws of the United States. Every citizen by the terms of his citizenship is obligated to do likewise. The brewer, distiller, or bootlegger who defies the Federal Government and its laws will not have the support of patriots. The sentiment against this outlawed traffic will grow until liquor will have no more standing in the courts, in legislative halls, or in the hearts of the people than has slavery, piracy, dueling, or the lottery traffic. Liquor is dying hard, but its end is inevitable.

THE TREATY OF VERSAILLES

THE terms presented by the twenty-seven Allied and Associated nations to Germany as the conditions on which they would make peace with her comprise a volume of eighty thousand words. Some idea of the extent of the treaty in which these terms are formulated—the longest treaty ever drawn—may be gained when it is stated that it is approximately a third as long as Woodrow Wilson's treatise on "The State," and is nearly as long as the Four Gospels. Simultaneously with the presentation of the treaty to the Germans an official summary (which would occupy about seven pages of The Outlook) was published in this country. From that summary the following account has been condensed.

The treaty consists of a Preamble and Fifteen Sections.

In the Preamble are named the twenty-seven Allied and Associated Powers constituting the parties of the first part, namely, the United States, the British Empire, France, Italy, Japan, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, China, Cuba, Ecuador, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, the Hedjaz, Honduras, Liberia, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, Poland, Portugal, Rumania, Serbia, Siam, Czechoslovakia, and Uruguay. Of these nations the first five are described as the principal Allied and Associated Powers. The party of the second part is Germany. Following the Preamble come the fifteen Sections.

Section I comprises the Covenant of the League of Nations.

Besides outlining the general duties of the League, this Covenant specifies certain obligations that the League will have with reference to enforcing the peace with Germany.

It will scrutinize Germany's observance of the neutralized zone;

Will appoint three of the five members of the Saar Commission (provided for later in the treaty), and oversee its régime;

Will appoint the High Commission of the free City of Dantsic (created by the treaty out of German territory);

Will work out the mandatory system, and act as the Court in plebiscites and certain designated disputes and problems;

Will direct international labor conferences, etc.

The Covenant of the League follows in general the outline heretofore published, with certain changes already reported in The Outlook.

Section II provides for the new boundaries of Germany.

These changes in boundary comprise, among other things:

The cession to France of Alsace-Lorraine;

The cession to Belgium of two small districts;

The cession to Poland of a great territory comprising over twenty-seven thousand square miles, East Prussia remaining German, but being isolated from Germany;

The loss, temporary or permanent, of certain other territories the status of which is to be determined later, or to be internationalized.

Section III makes certain provisions involved in the changes of boundary on the west.

In this section Germany—

Consents to abrogate the treaty by which Belgium was established as a neutral state, and recognizes certain changes in Belgium which have been made or are to be made by the League of Nations;

Releases the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg from the German Customs Union, and abrogates certain rights in that Duchy;

Agrees to the establishment of an unfortified zone extending to not less than fifty kilometers to the east of the Rhine.

Recognizes the moral obligation of restoring Alsace-Lorraine, with the frontiers as before 1871, and agrees to certain provisions as to citizenship, public property, the exportation and importation of goods, and the like;

Cedes to France, in compensation for the destruction of French coal mines in northern France, the full ownership of the coal mines in the Saar Basin—a small but rich district which lies north of Alsace-Lorraine—and agrees that that territory shall be governed by a Commission to be appointed by the League of Nations (consisting of five members, one French, one a native inhabitant of the Saar, and three representing three other countries other than France and Germany), with a continuance of the present basis of law, and with certain other provisions as to religious liberty, local voting, etc., for fifteen years, after which there will be a plebiscite to decide whether the people wish to remain under the League of Nations or to establish union with France or with Germany, the decision to be finally made by the League of Nations.

Section IV makes certain provisions involved in the changes of boundaries on the south and east.

Germany recognizes the total independence of German Austria;

Recognizes the independence of Czechoslovakia, with the frontiers indicated;

Cedes to Poland the territory indicated, with frontiers to be determined by a Commission;

Recognizes the fixing of the boundaries of East Prussia, which will have access to the rest of Germany, promises that German troops and authorities will move out from certain territories where the inhabitants are to decide their allegiance by plebiscite, and cedes the northeastern corner of East Prussia with a view to the future determination of the nationality of its inhabitants;

Agrees that Dantsic, the heretofore German port on the Baltic, will be hereafter a free city, under the guarantee of the League of Nations, for the use of Poland;

Agrees that the frontier between Germany and Denmark (to run through what is now Schleswig-Holstein) is to be determined by popular vote, to be taken in three zones successively;

Agrees to destroy fortifications in the harbors of Heligoland and Dune;

And agrees to respect as permanent and inalienable the independency of all territories which were part of the former Russian Empire, and to accept the abrogation of the Brest-Litovsk Treaty and other treaties made with the Bolsheviks.

Section V comprises provisions as to German possessions outside of Europe.

By this Section Germany renounces all rights and titles outside of Europe, and undertakes to accept whatever measures concerning them are determined by the five principal Allied and Associated nations;

Renounces in particular her overseas possessions, undertakes to pay damages suffered by the French in the Cameroons, and makes other agreements as to Africa;

Renounces all privileges obtained from China at the time of the Boxer uprising, accepts the abrogation of the concessions of Hankow and Tientsin, and renounces in favor of Great Britain, France, and China certain other rights in China;

Renounces privileges specified in Siam, Liberia, Morocco, and Egypt;

Accepts all arrangements which the Allied and Associated Powers make with Turkey and Bulgaria;

And cedes to Japan her rights and privileges in Kiaochow.

Section VI comprises provisions as to military, naval, and air forces.

By this Section Germany agrees to demobilize her troops within two months of the peace, reducing her army to 100,000 men, including 4,000 officers;

Agrees to the closing of all establishments for manufacturing or storing arms and munitions, "except those specifically excepted," and the discontinuance of the manufacture or importation of poisonous gases and analogous liquids;

Agrees to abolish conscription and to substitute voluntary enlistment for terms of twelve consecutive years for enlisted men and twenty-five years for officers, present officers agreeing to remain in service to the age of forty-five, and agrees that practically no military schools or military societies shall be allowed;

Agrees to dismantle all forts within fifty kilometers east of the Rhine, and not to build any new fortifications there;

Agrees to the execution of these provisions by Inter-Allied Commissions of control, which may establish headquarters at the German seat of government and go to any part of Germany at the German Government's expense;

Agrees to demobilize the German navy and to reduce the naval establishment to six small battleships, six light cruisers, twelve destroyers, twelve torpedo-boats, and no submarines, either military or commercial, with a personnel of fifteen thousand men and no reserve, under voluntary enlistment on the same terms of service as for the army, to surrender all German vessels of war in foreign ports, and certain specified war-vessels to sweep up all mines in the North Sea and the Baltic, to demolish all German fortifications in the Baltic defending the passages, to discontinue the use of the German high-power wireless stations of Nauen, Hanover, and Berlin for a period of three months after the peace except under supervision of the Allied and Associated Governments, and to an arrangement by which the fourteen German cables will not be restored to Germany;

Agrees that there will be no armed German air forces except of seaplanes retained to search for submarine mines, and that no aviation grounds or dirigible sheds be allowed within one hundred and fifty kilometers of the Rhine or of the eastern or southern frontiers, that all manufacture of aircraft be discontinued for six months, and that all aeronautical material be surrendered;

Agrees that while repatriation of German prisoners and civilians is to be carried out without delay, the Allies will have the right to retain selected German officers until Germany has surrendered persons guilty of offense against the laws and customs of war, and agrees to other provisions with regard to prisoners;

Agrees to aid in the identification of burial-places, etc.

Section VII deals with the responsibility for the war.

In this Section the Allies arraign William II of Hohenzollern, the former Kaiser, announce their intention to request Holland that he be surrendered, and state that they will try him with full guarantees of the right of defense, with a view of vindicating international obligations and international morality.

The Allies also announce that military tribunals (national or international, as each particular case may require) will try persons accused of violation of the laws and customs of war.

Germany agrees to hand over the accused and all necessary documents and information.

Section VIII specifies at length the reparation required from Germany.

The details even as compressed in the comparatively brief summary are too involved to be recounted here. The Allied and Associated nations recognize that Germany cannot make complete reparation, but she is required to make compensation for all damages caused to civilians under the following seven categories:

(a) Damage by personal injury to civilians caused by acts of war, directly or indirectly, including bombardments from the air.

(b) Damage caused to civilians, including exposure at sea, resulting from acts of cruelty ordered by the enemy and to civilians in the occupied territories.

(c) Damages caused by maltreatment of prisoners.

(d) Damages to the Allied peoples represented by pensions and separation allowances, capitalized at the signature of this treaty.

(e) Damages to property other than naval or military materials.

(f) Damage to civilians by being forced to labor.

(g) Damages in the form of levies or fines imposed by the enemy.

In addition Germany agrees to repay the sums borrowed by Belgium from her allies.

In order to carry the plan out there is to be an Inter-Allied Commission which will collect the payments to be made over a period of thirty years. Within two years Germany is to pay one thousand million pounds sterling ($5,000,000,000), in either gold, goods, ships, or other forms of payment, making other payments later.

The Commission (consisting of representatives from the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Belgium, with an alternate from Serbia or Japan when the interests of either of those countries are affected, and representatives of other countries present when their interests are involved, but without voting power) will have the right to examine the German system of taxation, will have its headquarters at Paris, and may require Germany to give guarantees.

Germany cedes to the Allies all German merchant ships of 1,600 tons gross and upwards, one-half of her ships between 1,600 and 1,000 tons gross, and one-quarter of her steam trawlers and other fishing boats; further agrees to build merchant ships for the account of the Allies at the rate of 200,000 tons gross annually for the next five years; further agrees to restore ships taken by Germany for inland navigation, and all this for the ultimate replacement, ton for ton and class for class, of all Allied merchant and fishing vessels lost owing to the war.

For the physical restoration of the invaded areas Germany undertakes to devote her economic resources. In doing that she will be required to replace stolen animals, machinery, etc., and to manufacture materials required for reconstruction purposes, "with due consideration for Germany's essential domestic requirements."

Germany agrees to turn over a specified and large amount of coal to France and Belgium, and other materials, such as benzol, dyestuffs, chemical drugs, etc.

Germany renounces all title to certain specified cables.

Germany also agrees to hand over certain literary, artistic, and historical possessions. Among the most interesting of these are certain paintings to Belgium, the "Koran of the Caliph Othman" to the King of the Hedjaz, "the skull of the Sultan Okwawa" (of East Africa) to the British Government, certain French flags captured in 1870-1 to France, and certain astronomical instruments seized in 1900-1 to China.

The remainder of this section deals with certain financial matters involved mainly in the apportioning of German debts to countries created out of German territory, and includes the requirement that Germany shall pay the cost of the Allies' armies of occupation.

Section IX covers a variety of agreements for re-establishing normal relations.

The agreements in this Section deal with tariffs, shipping rights, the prohibition of false wrappings and markings, etc., in unfair competition, the treatment of nationals, the re-admission of Germany to the Postal and Telegraphic Conventions, and the like, the satisfaction of pre-war debts, regulation of opium, and the property of religious missions.

Section X contains certain economic provisions.

In this Section rights are affirmed concerning the building of canals, the establishment of through routes by railway, and the use of rivers. These are for the purpose of giving Belgium access to the Rhine through German territory, allowing passenger and freight connections across German territory between the Allied Powers, and providing for Czechoslovakia's access to the sea (both to the Adriatic and to the north) and the equitable use of the Kiel Canal for the vessels of all nations at peace with Germany.

Section XI pertains to aerial navigation.

By this Section certain temporary provisions are made for the rights of aircraft in and over German territory.

Section XII has to do with questions of transportation.

Various provisions are made for the transit of persons, goods, ships, carriages, and mails, for free zones in German ports, for the internationalizing of rivers and parts of rivers, including the Elbe, the Oder, the Danube, and the Rhine.

Section XIII provides for international labor organizations.

An international labor conference and an international labor office are established by the members of the League of Nations. The conference is to meet annually for the drafting of conventions and the making of recommendations on labor matters. The international labor office is to be a continuous body connected with the organization of the League of Nations, for the purpose of collecting and distributing information on labor. The first meeting of the conference is to take place next October in Washington to discuss—the eight hour day or forty-eight hour week; prevention of unemployment; extension and application of the international conventions adopted at Berne in 1906 prohibiting night work for women and the use of white phosphorus in the manufacture of matches; and employment of women and children at night or in unhealthy work, of women before and after childbirth, including maternity benefit, and of children as regards minimum age.

What might be called a charter of labor or a labor bill of rights is appended to this Section.

Section XIV contains guarantees.

In this Section are contained perhaps the most humiliating portions of the treaty, for they provide for the occupation of German territory by Allied and Associated troops for fifteen years, with the proviso that certain portions will be evacuated as the conditions of the treaty are carried out, while if the Reparation Commission finds that the conditions are not carried out, the portions will be re-occupied.

Section XV contains miscellaneous provisions.

In this Section Germany agrees to recognize the treaties of peace which the Allied and Associated Powers make with the Powers that have been allied with Germany;

Agrees not to put forward any claim against any Allied or Associated Power based on events preceding the enactment of the treaty;

And accepts the decrees of the Allied and Associated prize courts.

The Treaty becomes effective in all respects for each Power on the date of the deposition of its ratification.

THE BIRTH OF THE AMERICAN LEGION

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE

The correspondent who, at our request, gives us the following account of the American Legion was until his recent return to civilian life a lieutenant of Field Artillery, U. S. A., and was a delegate from New York to the Legion's convention at St. Louis.—THE EDITORS.

"THAT'S the most satisfactory experience I've had in two years!" exclaimed the man in civilian clothing seated beside me at the St. Louis caucus last week, where was organized the American Legion, the name adopted by formal vote of the caucus.

"What is?" I asked.

With a grin he indicated a uniformed brigadier-general and a colonel just behind us, obliged to stand because of the lack of chairs.

"Two months ago it would have been a nervous shock simply to get this close to a B. G.," he explained. "And now just think of not even having to offer one your seat!"

The incident echoes the spirit of that altogether unique gathering of world war veterans whence sprang what has been called the "G. A. R. of the future," and which actually will be a mightier force because the boundaries of its membership are those of the entire Nation itself.

Rank counted for nothing at St. Louis. The "gob" was quite as much in evidence as the admiral, the doughboy as the general. More so, indeed, for the gathering leaned backwards in its insistence that democratic principles of selection prevail, the men with bars and stars on their shoulders, with notable individual exceptions, being actually less influential than the enlisted men.

The presiding officers chosen were a colonel from Texas, a Seattle sergeant, a New Mexican sailor, and a youthful marine private from Connecticut. Sectionalism was as notably absent as distinctions of rank or class. Maine's delegation, for instance, nominated the Texan Chairman, with Ohio seconding, while the State of Washington was vociferously dejected when its nomination of Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., of New York, as Chairman came to naught because "young Teddy" determinedly refused the honor.

"Pep" there was in plenty. The enthused spirit of America in arms carried on whole-souledly into the walks of peace, auguring great accomplishments for the future. To-day America's veterans actually are organized. The American Legion is a thing accomplished, and within a month the State sub-organizations will have enrolled perhaps half a million men, while the ultimate roster is limited only by the number of those who served—four million.

Four million young men united! Four million men who fought, or sought to fight, for American ideals—men of the North and South and East and West—fused with the common purpose of perpetuating those ideals. Truly an inspiring conception!

In Paris, in March, the first steps toward the creation of the American Legion were taken when delegates from all A. E. F. units met in preliminary caucus. Then, at the call of Colonel Roosevelt and Colonel Bennett Clark, son of Senator Champ Clark, came the organization meeting last week. This St. Louis gathering formulated the primary points of policy and administration, but, in deference to the men not yet returned from overseas, refrained from choosing permanent officers until the November convention, when the A. E. F. will be home and represented.

Every man and woman who wore the uniform between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, honorably discharged or eligible to honorable discharge by Army or Navy departments, may become a member of the Legion. Its ranks are also open to all American citizens who fought with any of our allies during the entire period of the Great War. Emphatically, conscientious objectors are excluded.

"For God and Country," says the Constitution of the American Legion, "we associate together for the following purposes: To uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States of America; to maintain law and order; to foster and perpetuate a one-hundred-percent Americanism; to preserve the memories and incidents of our association in the Great War; to inculcate a sense of individual obligation to the community, State, and Nation; to combat the autocracy of both the classes and the masses; to make right the master of might; to promote peace and good will on earth; to safeguard and transmit to posterity the principles of justice, freedom, and democracy; to consecrate and sanctify our comradeship by our devotion to mutual helpfulness."

The dominant note ringingly echoed by the thousand delegates was uncompromising Americanism. If the spirit of all the men who served even approaches that shown at St. Louis, America in the years immediately to come will be no pleasant place for Bolshevism or any other ism which spells peril for democratic institutions.

Consider the answer given the Illinois delegate's invitation that Chicago play host at the next National Convention. Even after the special committee presumably charged with the selection of the avored city had approved Chicago because of its geographical situation and transportation and hotel facilities, the caucus as a whole flatly refused to ratify that approval. Why? Because some one asked, "Who is the Mayor of Chicago?" And to clinch the matter there followed a two-minute whirlwind speech pillorying the alleged pro-German, pacifist, anti-American "Burgomeister" of Chicago, Mayor Thompson. In a welter of wild approval Minneapolis was given the meeting, and Chicago told that when her soldiers had purged her of her present executive the Legion would proudly meet there. All of which was hard upon the loyal soldiers of Illinois, themselves outspokenly opposed to Thompson, but well indicating the temper of the meeting.

Then came the resolution of Sergeant Jack Sullivan, of Seattle, for the deportation of all interned aliens and those who abandoned their first citizenship papers so as to avoid military service; and that of Major Richard Foster, of Kansas City, demanding investigation of the discharges given conscientious objectors and other evaders—both, of course, universally approved.

Politics were tabooed from top to bottom of the caucus—if it had a top or bottom. That was stressed. Says the constitution: "While requiring that every member of the organization perform his full duty as a citizen according to his own conscience and understanding, the organization shall be absolutely non-partisan and shall not be used for the dissemination of partisan principles or for the promotion of the candidacy of any person seeking public office or preferment."

Any who feared the Legion might start out as a vehicle for the political ambition of some man, group, or party was pleasantly disappointed. Some who felt that possibly "young Teddy was looking for something" were promptly disillusioned. For very firmly and vigorously Colonel Roosevelt refused to accept the unanimous nomination for Chairman, and when elected against his will again refused to serve; refusals made for the Legion's sake in the face of riotous, leather-lunged insistence, because he realized, as he told the caucus, that no slightest pretext must be given for thinking that selfishness had any hand in the organization's inception. And then when at last the delegates realized the finality of Roosevelt's decision, Colonel Henry D. Lindsley, of Texas, Democrat, was elected Chairman.

Another straw indicating the drift—which was no drift at all, but a full-powered flood—was the constitution's stipulation that no post shall be named after a living man, an intended barrier against political misuse. Then, too, unanimously the caucus forbade the taking of a "straw vote" poll of the members by a St. Louis newspaper, so desperately sincere was the determination to keep the Legion's skirts clean of possible political misinterpretation.

"What was the most notable thing done?" I asked Colonel Roosevelt at the close of the caucus.

"Turning down the grab for extra pay," came the prompt reply. "It's some soldiers' convention which carries on like that!"

Colonel Roosevelt referred to a resolution demanding six months' extra pay for discharged soldiers, defeated chiefly because Roosevelt himself echoed the spirit of the hour by declaring, "We came here to put something in the Government, not to take something away from it." All-American and all for America; non-sectional, non-political; and, when it came to something for itself, unselfish too. Truly, some convention!

VENIZELOS

KINGDOM-MAKER AND KING-BREAKER, THE FUGITIVE WHO BECAME A GREAT STATESMAN

TWO ARTICLES

I—IMPRESSIONS OF VENIZELOS

BY MAJOR CLIFFORD W. BARNES

DEPUTY COMMISSIONER, AMERICAN RED CROSS COMMISSION TO GREECE

Venizelos, the Prime Minister of Greece, is believed by competent judges to be one of the wisest and ablest of the statesmen at the Peace Conference. The treatment of the Greeks by Germany and her ally Bulgaria, combined with the treachery of King Constantine, constitutes one of the not least terrible chapters of the war. In a communication to The Outlook Major Barnes says:

"The Bulgarians were not slow in showing their German teachers what apt pupils they had become. In the cities of Kavala, Drama, and Seres the food supplies were confiscated. In the country districts the flocks and herds were seized; and then the entire population was placed upon a starvation diet. As the days passed, and the famine grew more severe, offers were made of work and food in Bulgaria for all able-bodied men and women. The temptation proved too great for some, and they sold themselves for the chance to live. But the majority remained, some thirty thousand in Seres, twenty-five thousand in Drama, twenty thousand in Kavala, and in the villages of the Pangion thirty thousand more. 'I shall never forget the horror of those days,' said an American tobacco merchant of Kavala. 'In the night I would hear people moaning for food, moaning like a wounded dog, and in the morning I would find them dead in front of my house—men, women, and children who had crawled there hoping for food.' It is fair to add that up to the limit of their ability these American merchants aided the suffering people who sought their help. They were lavish in their gifts of money, but their own supplies were doled out by the Bulgarians, and they had barely sufficient food to keep body and soul together."

In describing the return to their homes of the Greek civilian captives in Bulgaria last autumn when the armistice was signed, Major Barnes speaks as follows:

"Thirty-four American workers were quickly located at various strategic points along the railway, and this staff was largely increased by Greek helpers. Box cars and British lorries furnished the means of transportation from our supply depots at Kavala and Drama, and soon we were taking care of thousands of refugees, as day by day and night by night the long trains of box cars brought them from the various internment camps. It was pitiful to see how gladly they endured the trials of their dreadful journey because their faces were turned homeward—women of culture, men of refinement, children delicately nurtured, all packed into box cars which bore the sign 'Capacity seven horses or 32 men,' but which they crowded to the number of from seventy to one hundred. One car-load which we counted contained one hundred and ten men, women, and children. Many found the journey too much for their strength. A sick mother arrived one day with two children dead by her side, and from another car four men were carried out who had died since leaving the last station. A well-built man crawled painfully down from the train and started for our group of workers, when he was seen suddenly to totter, and just as our aid reached him he fell forward and died. Near one of these wayside canteens there were forty-five crosses in place last December, and there are doubtless more now, all marking the graves of refugees whose bodies had been taken from the train at that point."

Major Barnes says that "it is conservatively estimated that over 125,000 Greeks from Macedonia were transported into Bulgaria." No wonder that there is to-day, as there was two thousand years ago, a cry from Macedonia, "Come over and help us!" This, says Major Barnes, "was the cry Paul heard uttered by a man from Macedonia. Add to one man one hundred thousand; picture them bent by disease, wasted by hunger, standing in the midst of ruined homes and a devastated country; then hear the same cry from their lips, and you will have some conception of the appeal Macedonia is making to-day."

These are some of the problems that Venizelos is facing, and he needs all the help and sympathy he can get from this country.—THE EDITORS.

AN American with a military commission who spends several months in Greece and then meets her great Premier is pretty certain to receive at least three impressions of Eleutherios Venizelos.

One is obtained from the enemies of the man whom King Constantine termed "the Aaron Burr of the Greeks." These "Royalists" of Athens, regarding America as the avenger of injustice, are very determined that no American officer shall lack any details of this "renegade's" numerous crimes. "The madman from Crete" is the expression they use when reminding you of the revolutionary experiences of Venizelos in the days when Turkey governed the island where he was born, and when patriotic Greeks were struggling to throw off the terrible bondage which the Powers weakly permitted for their own selfish ends. They tell you of his "mad exploits" as a youth heading these island revolutionists, and never so happy as when he posed as "Dictator" in some great crisis. They say he has been a "traitor" to every cause he championed—first, in Crete, where he had no sooner gained control of the Liberal party than he became conservative; and, second, in Greece, when, having saved the throne and become the idol of the Royalists, he turned against the King and became a revolutionist. "He is," they affirm, "a supreme egoist, with no thought for any one but Venizelos," and even the men of his own party who differ from him "are ruthlessly broken."

When such statements, properly amplified, are made with an eloquence born of intense hatred, the picture which they gradually form in one's mind is somewhat Machiavellian in outline—a face that is marked by a foxlike cunning, which fascinates while at the same time it repels; black eyes which flash with a sinister gleam; thin lips which are firm but cruel; the type of man one tries to avoid.

But if the enemies of Venizelos are numbered by the hundred—which unfortunately is true—his friends are numbered by the tens of thousands, and a more passionate loyalty cannot be imagined. There is no doubt about their determination to give every American in Greece a "true impression" of their idol. He is "the savior of his country," they affirm, in an even truer sense than we can apply that term to Lincoln. The "madman from Crete" takes on a different aspect as one listens to their story. Born to affluence and well started in his profession as a lawyer, he sacrificed wealth and position to become the spokesman of the poor and oppressed in his island home. At the age of twenty he was the recognized leader of the "barefoot" party, which, under his wise guidance, soon gained control in the Cretan Assembly and passed many laws for the betterment of the people. It was a fierce and fanatical majority which he led, a party eager to crush the minority and to ride rough-shod over all who opposed, so that it took no small courage on the part of this young leader to speak in opposition to its unfair mandates and to say in the very hour of its greatest triumph:

A party should not be founded merely on numbers, but on those moral principles without which it can neither accomplish useful work nor inspire confidence.

But it was surely the act of a "madman" to resist with armed force not only Turkey but the combined Powers of Europe, to raise in rebellion the flag of Greece at Akrotiri, and endure without flinching the deadly fire of the Allied fleet. So one thinks until he hears the sequel—how this act of heroism opened the eyes of Europe to the shameless cruelty of Turkey and at last won for Crete her independence.

Then these friends tell you of ten years of arduous labor spent in an endeavor to unite the island with her mother country, when diplomacy was mingled with revolution, and Venizelos lived for months in the mountains—a price set upon his head. Many of his former followers, tempted by love of selfish ease, turned against him and joined the enemies who sought his death. One night they determined to assassinate the man who refused to lead as they desired. They surrounded his house, which they set on fire; but their intended victim, instead of attempting to escape, left the burning building by the front door, walked straight up to the infuriated mob, and cried so that all could hear:

You shall not force me to fail in my duty. History shall not accuse me of being a traitor. For our sake Greece has shed its blood in a disastrous war. I shall be faithful to it until the end.

Then the awed rioters let him pass, and he went back to the mountains.

In some form or other those are the words his friends keep repeating all through the thrilling story of this man's life, "Faithful until the end." Faithful to what he felt his duty, he saved the monarchy in its moment of greatest peril, won for the princes a place in the army, brought Constantine into popular favor and gave to him his throne. But when the King, misled by false advisers and a Prussian wife, refused to fulfill his treaty obligations with Serbia, turned his back on the old-time friends of Greece and lent secret aid to the Central Powers, it was not as some Aaron Burr that Venizelos fled from Athens to Salonika and raised the flag of revolution, but rather as another Washington, saying: "When the Government violates the rights of the people, insurrection becomes for the people and for each portion of the people the most sacred of rights and the most indispensable of duties."

With the King against him, the General Staff his enemies, the army pro-

German through the most skillful of propaganda, the public press controlled by Prussian sympathizers, and the Allies themselves cold and distrustful, only a man "faithful to the end" would have had the stupendous courage to establish an independent Government at Salonika and the steadfast patience to form an army from the untrained followers who gathered there.

"So," these enthusiastic friends continue, "it was Venizelos who saved the country by his far-sighted wisdom, his splendid courage, his untiring patience, his unselfish patriotism, his devotion to duty." But why go on? Is the man an embodiment of all human virtues, a militant saint without earthly passion, a sort of spiritual substance with an uncanny power for righteousness? Perhaps the impression one gains is that of an austere fanatic of the John Calvin type—a man with a thin, pale face and a tall, cadaverous figure; eyes that are large and glowing with the hidden fires of a spiritual passion; a dauntless will manifesting itself in every movement of an altogether striking personality.

It was in the early days of the Peace Conference that I met Mr. Venizelos. He was in Paris, staying at an unpretentious hotel far removed from the Place de la Concorde, near which most of the national delegates had their headquarters. I presented my letter of introduction in the morning, and was told by his secretary that an interview would be granted that afternoon at five. When I entered the long bedroom which had been transformed into an office for the Premier, I saw at the other end a gentleman of medium height, dressed in a black frock coat, standing in an unconventional manner at the desk of a stenographer, evidently dictating a letter. At the sound of our steps he laid down his notes, spoke a word to the stenographer, who immediately retired, and then turned with a smile to give us a hearty welcome. He has a pleasant voice, and nothing could have been more gracious than the words of warm appreciation with which he expressed his delight at the opportunity which he had coveted of thanking the American Red Cross, and through it the American people, for all the kindness they had shown to Greece.

Still holding my hand, he led me to a chair, and then, seating himself near by, he asked concerning conditions in Macedonia, from which I had recently returned. Much that I could tell him he already knew, but this did not seem to lessen his interest in my recital, and the tears which sometimes glistened in his eyes and his frequent exclamation, "My poor people!" showed how easily his sympathies could be stirred. The data which I had obtained relative to Bulgaria's treatment of the Greeks was to be laid before Secretary Lansing and a special committee of the Conference, and I was eager to have Mr. Venizelos suggest the best manner of presentation and the points which should be emphasized. His reply to my question was characteristic of the man and in perfect accord with the impression I was rapidly gaining: "Tell this story in your own way and place the emphasis where you think best. We Greeks are, naturally, considered to be prejudiced, and it is hard, under the circumstances, for us to be perfectly fair. But you Americans can be trusted to give an honest report, and all that Greece wants to-day is justice."

His eyes, which are large but of a gentle expression, looked straight into mine. He wore, as always, a pair of rimmed spectacles of the old-fashioned variety, which added to the fatherly appearance caused by his white hair and gray beard. But the healthy color of his somewhat round face, the smile which plays so constantly about his rather full lips, the rapidly changing expression which responds to every emotion, all this gives one an impression of youth, strength, and buoyancy which might belong to a man of thirty rather than fifty-five. Mr. Venizelos differs from the ordinary Greek in using few gestures when he speaks. His English is excellent, and he has a direct and simple way of saying things which adds to the impression of absolute sincerity that his straight glance invariably makes. In all our conversation, some of which touched upon the part Greece had been led to play in the war drama through the agency of her great Premier, there was never the remotest trace of egotism, but instead a self-elimination and a spirit of honest humility which were as beautiful as they are rare in the world's leading statesmen. There was at all times, too, the most engaging frankness, as that of a man who spoke to a trusted friend and who had an abounding faith in the good intentions of his fellows.

As our talk progressed there was no sense of hurry, no attempt to shorten my stay by giving the impression that matters of vast importance claimed his attention—a trick we business men know so well—but, instead, a hearty cordiality which made his words ring true when, at parting, he walked hand in hand with me to the door and expressed regret that our interview was ended.

As I thought it all over afterwards, it seemed to me that this man and Lincoln, despite differences in training and experience, had very much in common. Both were honest, simple, and straightforward in thought and word; both were statesmen of far-sighted vision who could compromise a present advantage for a future good; both were frank and trustful in dealing with their fellow-men; both suffered the most bitter persecution for their country's sake, and did it with a smile; both possessed extraordinary patience combined with fearless courage; and the words I have quoted from Venizelos are strikingly characteristic of Lincoln: "You shall not force me to fail in my duty. I shall be faithful until the end."

II—THE NEW GREECE AND THE NEW BALKANS

BY ELEUTHERIOS K. VENIZELOS, PREMIER OF GREECE

AN AUTHORIZED INTERVIEW WITH GREGORY MASON,
STAFF CORRESPONDENT OF THE OUTLOOK

TURKEY is too thoroughly broken up by the war ever to make trouble in the family of nations again. But Bulgaria, although beaten, is still filled with the Prussian spirit, and Bulgaria must be closely watched. This is the opinion of Eleutherios Venizelos, the great statesman and Premier of Greece, by many competent critics considered to be the most astute statesman in Europe to-day.

Yesterday I went to see the Greek Premier in his Paris hotel. He seems to be standing the strain of the Peace Conference better than many of his distinguished colleagues. His complexion is clear, his eye bright. Although my interview was the last event on a long programme, his manner was as animated and his voice as resonant as if he were just beginning his long day instead of ending it.

We talked first about the territory Greece claims in Asia Minor.

"Is there any danger that the awarding of this territory to Greece will lead to a future war between Greece and Turkey?" I asked the Premier.

"Not the slightest," he answered, promptly. "No one need fear Turkey any more. She will be too weak to make any more trouble. Turkey will be powerless to attack Greece or any other state of any importance whatsoever. The Sick Man of Europe is in his grave."

"But if you should ask me the same question about Bulgaria," continued Mr. Venizelos, "I would answer without hesitation that there is danger from Bulgaria."

"You think Bulgaria is not thoroughly defeated, thoroughly chastened, then, your Excellency?"

"Bulgaria is thoroughly defeated," Mr.

Venizelos answered, "but Bulgaria is not thoroughly chastened. The same is true of Turkey, but Turkey will be in no position to make any more trouble. Bulgaria, however, might go on a rampage again. Bulgaria is like Germany. She has had a good beating, and one that she will not soon forget, but she is still filled with the imperialistic Prussian spirit. It will be dangerous for other nations to forget this."

Mr. Venizelos stopped and stroked his beard. "When I say that Turkey will not be dangerous," he began again, speaking more slowly, "I am assuming several things. I am assuming, of course, that Greece will be given the territory that she is fairly entitled to in Asia Minor. To leave that territory to Turkey would not only be an injustice to Greece, it would be to endanger the future peace of the world as well. In the vilayets of Aidin and Brusa, as well as in the independent sanjaks of Ismid and the Dardanelles, are living altogether more than a million Greeks. They have lived there for three thousand years. They are skilled workmen and brain-workers, and they are the intellectual backbone of that whole region. They support in all 565 churches and 652 schools, with 91,548 students. If you add to this population the population of the Dodecanesus Islands, who are really one with the people of the mainland in both a geographical and an economical sense, you would have 1,188,359 Greeks, omitting those in the city of Brusa and in parts east of that place which it would be fair to leave within the Turkish state."

"By all principles of justice, and particularly by the principles expressed in the famous Fourteen Points of President

Wilson, the territory inhabited by these 1,188,359 Greeks ought to be given to Greece. Ottoman sovereignty must from now onward be limited to the interior of the country, where the Turkish element is really predominant. Remember particularly that statement in number twelve of the Fourteen Points, 'The other nationalities which are now under Turkish rule should be secured an undoubted security of life, and an absolutely unmolested opportunity of autonomous development.'

"It is unthinkable that the Great Powers will permit the Turks any longer to misgovern and tyrannize over these unhappy Christians who form unquestionably the intelligent and productive portion of the whole population. Of course we would be willing to let the Turks use Smyrna as a free port for their inward and outward trade."

"It is also worth remembering," continued Mr. Venizelos, "that the Greeks who live in Asia Minor form the purest ethnical remnant of the Hellenic type."

"Next to being awarded this territory in Asia Minor herself, what would Greece prefer to have done with it?" I asked the Premier.

"No other solution is thinkable," he replied, emphatically. "If the Great Powers decline to award that territory to Greece, we will have to accept their decision, but we would do so only under protest. Such a solution would violate the fundamental spirit of the ideals the Allies have been fighting for."

It had been reported in the newspapers a few days before this interview took place that the principal objector to the awarding to Greece of the territory she claimed in Asia Minor was America.

When I asked the Greek Premier about this, he said :

"America at first, I think, was not quite sure of the wishes of the Hellenes living in Asia Minor. Since then a stream of resolutions and requests from those Greeks to be incorporated with the mother land has poured in, and I think there is no longer any doubt in any one's mind on this point."

I asked the Premier if there was any possibility of a compromise between Greece and Italy in regard to the Dodecanesus Islands. These, it will be remembered, were seized by the Italians from the Turks in 1912, during the war between Italy and Turkey. At the time, however, the Italians in official proclamations to the inhabitants, who are all Greeks except for a few Turks in Rhodes, declared that the purpose of their occupation was to free the natives from Turkish rule as a preliminary step to getting them self-government. Italy has since then never shown any disposition to give up these islands, however, and by her secret treaty with England, France, and Russia, of April 28, 1915, Italy was given definite ownership of the Dodecanese. The Greeks claim, however, that this secret treaty can and ought to be ignored, in view of the change in the war aims of the Allies brought about by America's participation in the war. America, it is understood, heartily supports the Greek demand for these islands, and England and France seem not inclined to consider themselves irrevocably bound by their secret treaty with Italy, now that the dark and devious ways of the old European imperialism are discredited in the eyes of democratic peoples everywhere.

My question brought out quite a show of feeling from the Greek who through his whole life has been leading his people toward liberty. "Compromise?" he demanded. "Of course there can be no compromise on that question, where right and wrong are as distinct as black and white. By all that is fair Greece is entitled to those islands. The population is entirely Greek, except for a small colony of Turks in Rhodes."

"As to Thrace and Constantinople, your Excellency, if Greece cannot have them, what does she think ought to be done with them?"

"Regarding Thrace there can be no other possible solution, and our people there greatly outnumber those of any other Christian nationality. There seems to be no doubt but that we are going to be given Thrace. It may interest you to know that the Turks in Thrace sent copies of a resolution to the heads of the Great Powers and to myself affirming that in case they cannot be incorporated in the new Turkish state they prefer government by Greeks to government by Bulgarians, in fact, that they could not tolerate being ruled by Bulgarians under any circumstances. We would prefer to have Constantinople under the Greek flag also, of course, but, as Constantinople is the center of an international movement and commands the Bosphorus, we will be satisfied to see Constantinople controlled by a mandatory of the League of Nations."

"What Power does Greece prefer as a mandatory for Turkey, and why?"

"We prefer England, France, or America for that job," answered the man who has been fighting Turks since he first took up arms against them thirty years ago on behalf of his native Crete. "We prefer one of them because they are all strong enough to fulfill this commission well, and because each of them is trustworthy. France's record in her colonies, England's record in Egypt and India, your record in Cuba and the Philippines, prove that any one of you can be trusted by weaker nations."

"You would not object to the United States, then?"

"On the contrary, we would warmly welcome American control in Turkey."

The conversation then shifted across the Bosphorus. I asked the Premier what Greece's attitude would be toward a union between the Bulgarians and the Jugoslavs.

"Of course we would have no objection to such a union," he said, "but I think it is very unlikely in this generation, or even in the next."

"But I have heard several Jugoslavs speak about it as a probability, your Excellency."

"Oh, yes, no doubt you have heard Croats and Slovenes speak about it. They did not fight Bulgaria, they have no bitterness for her. But, unless I am greatly mistaken, the Serbs, who are the strongest element in the new Yugoslav state, will have nothing to do with the Bulgarians. You might as well talk about a union between France and Germany as to talk of uniting the Bulgarians and the Serbs. People don't soon forget the sort of things that Bulgaria has done. When she occupied Greek Macedonia, she carried away 120,000 Greeks. Only half of those have returned or have been found. What has become of the rest? That was only one of the things Bulgaria did to us. Well, she was even more barbarous to the Serbs. I don't think you'll find Serbs shaking hands with Bulgarians for a while yet."

In response to a question as to what he considered were the prospects for a Balkan union, Mr. Venizelos said :

"I consider that the prospects for a Balkan union of Rumania, Serbia, and Greece are very bright. We would begin moderately of course, with a defensive alliance, and then would gradually tighten the union until we had a common Ministry of Foreign Affairs and common tariffs and postal union. We might even have a common general staff for a common Balkan army, although each state would keep its own quota of soldiers distinct from the others. It would be plainly understood that as far as its military purposes are concerned such an alliance would be for purely defensive ends. We would all be bound to protect each other against outside aggression, but if one of us should make war on an outside nation the other Balkan states would not be bound to assist her."

The draft of the Covenant for the League of Nations has been made in such a way as to leave it possible for purely defensive alliances of smaller groups of nations to be included, and it is believed that this was done as a result of the representations Mr. Venizelos made in regard to the importance of a defensive alliance among the Balkan States. According to the theory, Bulgaria may be admitted to this Balkan union later if she behaves herself and proves that she has renounced her ambitions for attaining the hegemony of the Balkan Peninsula. It is the opinion of Mr. Venizelos that the Czechoslovaks might join this Balkan league. He does not consider the Hungarians as possible candidates.

When I asked Mr. Venizelos which he considered the more dangerous, the possible creation of a new strong group of Teutonic-Hungarian-Bulgarian Central Powers or the advance of Bolshevism in Central Europe, he answered as follows :

"Of course Germany is going to be strong. That cannot be avoided. But the question is whether or not she is going to be too strong—that is, whether she is going to be so strong that she will again leap on smaller nations as she did in 1914."

"As to Bolshevism, you will find few Greeks who are afraid of that. Of course we are in a fortunate position. We are victorious, and Bolshevism does not attack victorious countries. Then, too, Bolshevism is an industrial disease, and Greece is mainly an agricultural and maritime nation."

"What about Bolshevism in Turkey?"

"Oh, that's pure camouflage to scare the rest of us," answered the Premier. "Turkey has very little industry, and her whole religion is diametrically opposed to anything like Bolshevism, teaching, as it does, unquestioning obedience to authority. Bolshevism in Bulgaria, too, is mostly camouflage, for Bulgaria is mainly an agricultural country. But Bolshevism in Hungary is nothing false. It is the real Bolshevism, and strongly rooted, for in Hungary the people who till the soil do not own it."

The last question I asked the Premier was, "What is the attitude of Greece in the territorial dispute between Italy and the Jugoslavs?"

"Neutral, of course," he responded, "but—" (he smiled significantly and said no more).

Venizelos has always believed that it is better for a state to have strong friends on her borders than it is for her to extend those borders in a way to make enemies. Again and again in his career he has shown himself willing to make concessions in order to keep the friendship of neighboring states.

GENERAL PERSHING'S FAMOUS INDIAN SCOUTS WITH THE EXPEDITIONARY FORCES IN FRANCE
These Indians also served with the American Commander-in-Chief during the Mexican Punitive Expedition

THE AMERICAN INDIAN IN THE WAR

BY CAROLINE DAWES APPLETON

WITH the declaration of war between the United States and Germany the red man came forward, his "untutored" energies well rallied, his priceless battle lore roused from its long lethargy, and proffered the white man's Nation the supreme sacrifice of his own national life. Quietly, beneath the dignity of crested plumes, bright war paint, and enshrouding blankets, the chiefs of fourteen great Indian tribes gathered at the mighty council fire in Washington and laid their services on the altar of patriotism.

The significance of the act, which preceded even the advance rumors of the draft, was remarked by some, and a few private and personal tributes were made to the tremendous spirit involved. Already known as the "vanishing race," the American Indian undertook to seal the death warrant of his national entity by proffering the best of his blood and courage, mentality and manhood. Perhaps no greater, and less calculated, sacrifice has been made in the great war. Its recognition has been far from general, the responsive tribute and acclaim sadly limited in scope.

Cato Sells, Commissioner of Indian Affairs in Washington, renders unqualified testimony to the selfless devotion and heroism of the American Indian in a recent official report. Commissioner Sells reopens that dusty volume of American history which deals with the native-born red man and adds an indelible line to the long list of loyal service he has rendered to an adopted cause and flag:

"I regard their representation of nine thousand in the United States camps and in actual warfare as furnishing a ratio to population unsurpassed, if equaled, by any other race or nation."

Of these nine thousand, nearly eighty-five per cent are of voluntary enlistment, and occupy rank in nearly every grade and branch of the service, from their natural sphere in infantry and cavalry to the dizzy heights of aviation and the technicalities of the Signal Corps. There have been no separate or segregate Indian organizations, with the unofficial exception of "Pershing's Indian Scouts," a body of skilled Apaches and Sioux who formed a part of the General's punitive expedition into Mexico, and who have rendered brilliant scout duty overseas. Their adroit tactics, sense of strategy, and feats of camouflage, the outgrowth of an ancient training in the science of war, have proved invaluable. One company of the 142d Infantry is composed entirely of Indians, but without official designation; these are all volunteer Choctaws, presumably so assembled because of their intense community spirit and fraternal association and in the interests of that mechanical unity which is vital to success in action.

There has been no protest or complaint emanating from Indian sources against their undistinguished, unacclaimed service to the country which is by heredity their own and to the flag which is theirs only by adoption, and that adoption not without painful and unpleasant associations and memories.

Colonel Henry C. Smither, U. S. A.,

a graduate of West Point, and for many years a valued member of the General Staff, is an Indian, and perhaps the most signal figure among his race's trained fighting men. Colonel Smither's professional career has been the admiration of military authorities who have looked for and found manifestations of his striking ability in the science of arms and warfare in the ranks of his less tutored racial brothers. Although by profession, and perhaps by instinct, a cavalry officer, Colonel Smither has served with the General Staff in France throughout this war.

Carlisle, the famous Indian college, has sent one hundred and sixty-one men to foreign service, among them three young officers who have won extraordinary renown: Lieutenant Benedict Cloud, U. S. A., Lieutenant Gustavus Welch, U. S. A., and Lieutenant Sylvester Long Lance, who was four times reported dead in the annihilating battles of the "Princess Pats." Pete Garlow, of Carlisle gridiron fame, is in the Marine Corps, as is Private Joseph Oldshield, a grandson of the famous chief Red Cloud.

Haskell Institute, at Lawrence, Kansas, raised a service flag of one hundred and fifty stars, and a small school at Phoenix, Arizona, sent sixty-two volunteers and raised $27,000 in the first Liberty Loan and another thousand in War Savings Stamps.

But these figures are microscopic in the grand total of the Indians' aggregate financial sustenance of the United States' war measures. Commissioner Sells estimates a conservative total of $15,000,000, or a per capita subscription of approximately fifty dollars, to the Liberty Loan.

Jackson Barnett, a member of the Five Civilized Tribes of Oklahoma, individually took $660,000 of the second issue of bonds, and $175,000 of the third issue. The Osages, who are the richest tribe in the country, rallied a population of 2,180 and subscribed $226,000!

The poorer Indian tribes have proved their hereditary pride of country in a thousand ways, ranging from the pathetic to the superb. In the snake-infested bogs and swamps of certain Western sections Indian lads, too young for enlistment or draft, have given vent to their passionate patriotism in the perilous service of gathering sphagnum moss, which has been found of unique medicinal value in the field hospitals of France. It was used for surgical pads and dressings, and was gathered at heroic cost by young embryo warriors whose grievance was that they were too young to fight.

The women have toiled untiringly over farms and cattle, and have found time to execute complicated beadwork and basketry, rug-weaving and knitting, the sale of which has netted a considerable sum invested in bonds, stamps, and war relief work.

Thus it has been also with the food problems, which have touched the vast corn-growing regions so largely populated and intensively cultivated by Indians. By means of the several excellent publications of the various Indian schools, the food needs of the country and the Allies have been made clear and plans have been made and carried out productive of enormous results. In the wheat districts of Montana, where the Indian population is landed but not wealthy and nearly all are full-blooded red men, councils and meetings have been held regularly for the purpose of discussing war measures and their own part in them. Every Indian who had a growing wheat crop donated one or more sacks of grain; in the Southwest sheep-growers donated one or more fleeces of wool per man to a specified war relief work.

The casualty lists bear heavy tribute to the red race, but not without reading between the lines. The tribal name has suffered by civilization.

John Peters, for example, a Menominee, serving with the First Engineers, died in France from wounds received in action. He was among the first to enlist, the first to embark, and the first to die; his name was among the first to flash from column to column of newspaper casualty lists throughout the country. But only the Keshena Indian School, in Wisconsin, knew and claimed him as a "son of that long, unconquerable line," while the squaws of Shawano County lifted up their voices in wailing and sped the warrior's soul to the Happy Hunting-Ground.

Private Ben Green, a Tuscarora, of New York State, fell on Vimy Ridge; and the first Indian killed with the Canadian forces, whose Indian fighters are many of them world renowned, was Lieutenant Cameron Brant, of the Six Nations, a direct descendant of Joseph Brant, the great Indian military genius who fought with the British during our own War of the Revolution.

The fleet Indian messenger of bygone wars has never been adequately supplanted by motor cycle and tractor. Indian scouts, Pershing's Apaches and Sioux, and many drawn from among the runners of the Hudson's Bay Company, whose pride is Tom Longboat, the champion distance man, passed through shell craters and barbed-wire entanglements with that lithe ease and silence which have characterized Indian strategy.

Floberth W. Richester, whose name has a romantic colonial flavor, lays claim to being the first Indian aviator to join the Lafayette Escadrille. But the credit of the first air flight of an Indian, who thus rendered himself akin to the eagle, is a plume in the head-dress of a Blackfeet chief, Two-Guns-White-Calf, of the Glacier Reservation, in Montana. Chief White-Calf won the privilege in contest with Chief Lazy Boy, of the Indian police, and presented his own qualifications as inherited from his father, Chief of the Piegan Nation, "who presented the United States with Glacier National Park—and was not afraid to die."

During the fever heat of war preparation and sustenance of elaborate war measures, when skilled labor was recruited from unexpected sources, Indians were used by the Government in practical refutation of the "lazy Injun" stigma. Over fifty have done swift, sure work at the Hog Island shipyards, and many more in factories and munitions plants, handling war contracts. One large motor firm, overcome by its amazement, felt called upon to write the Department of the Interior a formal word of praise and astonishment that "the Indians employed here are turning out to be first-class men—and steady!"

The call for volunteers "for dangerous duty" frequently brought from the ranks an Indian of Carlisle or Haskell training, who set forth his right to die in a flow of oratory characteristic of his race. One described his claim as the "inalienable, unchallengeable right of the native born," and later, dying, refused assistance from the rescue party and demanded the further privilege of dying alone and unmolested!

These reports from overseas add a vital and hitherto unconsidered note to the international problem of reconstruction. While the Indian nation has suffered heavily in casualties, the Indian troops still overseas, scattered through many divisions and withdrawn from many sections of the western front, demonstrate a remarkable co-ordinate ambition. They show an alert interest in foreign affairs and conditions; they are studying foreign systems of agriculture and the intensive economies of peasant life, and applying the information thus obtained to an ambitious interpretation of their own and their tribal future. They are not only acquiring a better use of the English language but show marked linguistic ability in learning French. They are, furthermore, becoming actively conscious of that pleasing lack of race prejudice which is a generous and at the same time profitable characteristic of France.

It is the opinion of Indian authorities and students generally that the red man should return to something more than undistinguished collective acclaim. Broadened by travel and associations, reaching upward from the groundwork of education already established at home, the Indian will scarcely be content, though he may be silent, to return to the life he left.

The accouterments of modern warfare have not been too heavy for the peace-softened muscles of the red man. But the task is a heavy one, the load a dull one, of bread-earning and crop-producing on the arid fields and sunburnt wastes which are nearly all that are left him of his royal heritage of wide rivers swarming with fish, black virgin soil, and forest lands rich with deer.

AFTER-THE-WAR RELIGION IN ENGLAND

BY PHILIP WHITWELL WILSON

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT, LONDON "DAILY NEWS"

AMERICANS returning from England share my own impression that death and pain have deepened, not destroyed, religion in that country—that the war has rebuked those who said in their hearts that there is no God. But the undoubted revival of faith challenges analysis. To some extent people seek comfort in the external. The pageant of war is reflected in ecclesiastical ceremonies—in impressive memorial services which are not in themselves a substitute for individual thought, prayer, and piety. Many soldiers are buried in nameless and distant graves, and women therefore bring flowers to the local Calvary, where the names of their dead are inscribed on what is in effect an altar. This custom, with others like it, awakens sentiments usually associated with Catholic practice, and some devotions even in Protestant churches suggest prayers for or with the dead. Parallel with this tendency is the crusade led by Sir Oliver Lodge, who, having himself lost a son, joins with Sir Arthur Conan Doyle in advocating intercourse with the departed. In this atmosphere the late Mr. Stead used to work, and in his case, as in that of his recent followers, true and sincere inquiry has been embarrassed by quacks and fortune-tellers, especially in the West End, where parents, worldly and indifferent to religion before the war, were suddenly confronted with the strain of seeing their nearest and dearest in deadly danger. They needed resource and were ready to find it anywhere.

The yearning for religion is not always accompanied by a clear conception of what religion means. Mr. H. G. Wells has discovered the existence of the Deity and congratulated the Deity on this interesting result of his own thinking. In those brief but beautiful lyrics which so many soldiers wrote before they fell there was often a strange and wistful longing for God. Men have valued the Y. M. C. A., but they have not accepted the canteen as an alternative for the Church. Instinctively they know that they cannot be redeemed with corruptible things like tea and coffee. Yet the British workman is not, and never has been, a rationalist. In talking these things over, I never found among our men the kind of anti-belief which I discovered in Polish Jews and Russian refugees who used to assemble at Toynbee Hall in London and other university settlements. Among trade-unionists, Bradlaugh and Ingersoll had few followers, and Robert Blatchford, of the "Clarion," who tried to popularize their revolt against the creeds, never founded a movement. Men were ready to say that the churches failed, but they were not ready to add that God and Christ were a myth.

Unlike his Continental comrades, the British workman, in his age-long struggle for a more abundant life, has usually discovered that the men and women whom he could most fully trust were Christian. In successive centuries he has been led to greater liberty by Wycliffe and Latimer, Cromwell, Bunyan, and Milton, the Wesleys and Whitefield, Bright and Gladstone, by Ruskin, Shaftesbury, and Kingsley. All these men were reared on the Bible and became its practical interpreters. During the last twenty years their places have been taken by great democratic preachers like Dr. Clifford, the retiring Bishop of Oxford, and the late Silvester Horne, by Canons Barnett and Scott Holland. Even the Catholic Church had Cardinal Manning, while pure evangelicalism was represented by General Booth and Dwight L. Moody. The workmen absorbed this varied but always reverent teaching of social and religious truth. From such seed the harvest was the most remarkable growth of Christian companionship since Methodism—I mean the Brotherhood Movement.

In churches and chapels, in music halls, and any other convenient edifice men met every Sunday afternoon for a brief, bright, and brotherly service. There were hymns, solos, prayer, and a Scripture reading, with an address of about half an hour, and the meeting was usually concluded within sixty minutes. There was no questionnaire, so popular in the American forum, and the speaker is usually a layman, though clergymen and ministers are not excluded. Each Brotherhood built up a careful membership, with a visiting committee to call on the absent, and in the promotion of sobriety the crusade has proved its redemptive value. The orchestra is unpaid, and often sounds like that, but in its vagaries it suggests the idea of free-will service. At those meetings the aggregate attendance before the war was about six hundred thousand men.

Some may have been drawn from regular worship, but in the main they were men who would not have gone to church.

The Brotherhood strongly favors the under dog. There are collections for the distressed in Armenia and Belgium, and in certain cases the families of strikers have been relieved. Against liquor and vice and bad housing the movement is whole-hearted, but it is not Puritan. It adjourns for tea parties on Sunday. It enjoys humor. It laughs and claps its hands. By impenitent conservatism it has been denounced as political, and at elections there is no doubt which side it takes. The overwhelming triumph of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman in 1906 was due in no small measure to the link established by the Brotherhoods between Labor and Nonconformity—between the Manchester School and organized trade unions.

The Brotherhoods were decimated by war. Young men went to fight, leaving old men to discover the dullness of life without them. In the British army church parade was still compulsory, and a certain outward respect was paid to the dignified and beautiful liturgy, often read by chaplains under dramatic conditions. But there is no discoverable drift of Britain's manhood back to an "established" religion. It is not through creeds, catechism, and litany that the Englishman's soul is to-day expressed. In the Brotherhoods there is neither baptism nor holy communion; and the ritual is reduced to a hand-shake and a slap on the back. A definite church membership, as understood, let us say, by Presbyterians, is not involved in attendance, and critics allege with truth that the Brotherhood, however useful in itself, does not lead men back to the older Christian societies. It is indeed a curious blend between the trade union with its weekly pence, the Gospel meeting with its conversions, and the Quaker service with its lay ministry. As a realization of "the Bride of Christ" the Brotherhood must be pronounced imperfect, if only because at present the meetings are usually limited to men, the women assembling separately in sisterhoods, though in fewer numbers. A church is not complete in which the sexes are separate and the young children otherwise dealt with.

The problem before the ecclesiastical statesmen of Britain is to associate the Brotherhood Movement with the older forms of Christian worship. Here are multitudes on Mars Hill, listening to great argument. Can they be brought into the Temple at Jerusalem without provoking, as Trophimus, the Ephesian, did, a riot among the orthodox and the priestly? The Established Church has a Young Men's Society, consisting of communicants, and recently the reformers of the "Establishment" have adopted baptism, rather than confirmation or the communion, as the basis of a proposed franchise in Church councils. Hence the resignation of Dr. Gore from the See of Oxford. As a High Churchman, he insists on the strictest spiritual test, and is quite ready to sacrifice the connection with the state if thereby he can secure the unfettered autonomy of the actual, rather than the nominal, worshipers in the Church.

It is towards Baptists, Congregationalists, and Methodists that the Brotherhood men lean, yet here also there are difficulties. The schemes of Christian reunion developed by Dr. J. H. Shakespeare and others do not include recognition of Brotherhoods or any other purely lay effort. The idea is rather to stiffen up ceremonial in Nonconformity until it meets the approval of Episcopalians, just as Episcopalians stiffen up their ceremonial to the level of Roman Catholics. With every such turn of the ecclesiastical screw the Brotherhoods are naturally forced towards the Quaker conception of religious orders, and in past years the brain of the movement was largely developed in "adult schools" inaugurated by the Society of Friends. Christian reunion would prevent overlapping in the villages and the mission field and would display Christian charity to the world. But reunion with Canterbury and Rome does not mean of necessity reunion with Brotherhood and the more democratic forms of Christian effort.

At the adult schools men talk over passages of Scripture and discuss modern or personal problems. The nucleus of these groups is fairly orthodox, but along the fringes a wide latitude of opinion is allowed. Still further to the left we find the Ethical Societies, filled with sincere people who are impatient of theological and sometimes of the usual social restraints. An interesting subject of speculation is whether the Ethical Societies, arguing freely yet constructively over the field of thought and economics, will be drawn, irresistibly, to solutions suggestive of Christ's authority. They will never come back to the churches as organized. They may return, imperceptibly, to the Founder of the churches.

Wherever Wheels Turn

In the kitchen of a great hotel, someone throws a switch, and, with amazing swiftness, potatoes are peeled, meat chopped, ice made, cut and chipped, ice cream frozen, meals cooked, dishes washed—all by electricity.

Somewhere upon the broad highway of the Atlantic, a dreadnaught, majestic and mighty, hurls its thousands of tons through the waves, propelled by the force of electricity.

An airplane darts across the heavens—to it electricity is the spark of life in the engine and the one tie that links earth and sky.

Such is the miracle of electricity, that while scarcely more than thirty years ago it was but an imperfect means of illumination—nothing more—to-day it is doing countless important tasks wherever wheels turn.

And such are the vastness and versatility of Westinghouse engineering and manufacturing that in whatever field electricity is used, there you will come upon the familiar Westinghouse symbol.

The explanation of Westinghouse universality is not far to seek. Born of vision and genius, it has ever been at the forefront of electrical development.

It placed electric lighting on a commercial basis. It made possible cheap and efficient transmission of power over long distances. It introduced the steam turbine into America and developed it to the stage of practical use. It produced the turbine-generator.

To it, likewise, the world owes the marine turbine with reduction gear; the apparatus with which Niagara Falls was first harnessed; the first practical meter for the measuring of electric current and many other notable contributions to progress.

To-day sixteen plants and between 40,000 and 50,000 persons are required to meet the world-wide demands for Westinghouse engineering and Westinghouse products.

2. What part does it seem President Wilson played in this affair? State and defend your opinion of the President's attitude and action.
3. What facts lead The Outlook to believe that "the cases of Italy and Japan in the Peace Conference" are analogous, and "that whatever differences there are in the analogy between the two cases are in favor of Italy"?
4. Give reasons why you believe that The Outlook has or has not gone too far in pointing out "certain conclusions that an impartial observer might draw from these facts"?
5. For what reasons does sympathy in America seem to be with China rather than with Japan over the question of the east coast of Asia?
6. In your opinion, are suspicions of Japanese activities in China well founded?
7. Discuss whether Japan is a treaty-breaking nation.
8. What would you consider legitimate claims to industrial and commercial expansion for Japan in Asia to be?
9. Name and outline the two ways The Outlook says Japan's interests in Asia can be secured. Which way is preferable, and why?
10. Discuss the duty of the leading world Powers toward China.
11. State definitely whether the United States, in your opinion, should take part in a constructive programme for China.
12. Do you think Americans should be patient and forbearing toward Japan? Reasons.

B. Topic: America's Foreign Trade.

TRANSLATION OF HIS LETTER

A friend of mine told me that he has called your attention to the Waterman's Fountain Pen held in my hand, in one of my pictures.

I bought it in Buenos Aires eight years ago when I was traveling in South America giving literary lectures, and since then I have written with it my novels, Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse, Our Sea, and actually the latest one, entitled The Enemies of the Woman. Furthermore, I have written with it hundreds of articles for the newspapers in favor of the Allied cause and the ten big volumes of my History of the War of 1914.

As you see, the poor pen has worked well. For this reason, it is a little old and tired, but continues to serve me.

Best regards from

The needs of Young America must go forward!

OF necessity, the war halted peace-time construction and development. Meanwhile, our future citizens continued to attain "school age" and with it their rights to American surroundings.

Cities and States, to keep pace with their fast growing populations, will now quickly carry into effect far-sighted programs for public improvements.

The needed money will be raised by the issue and sale of State and Municipal bonds.

Such bonds put both men and women to work.

Whenever public enterprises and betterments go forward, labor thrives and industry hums.

When you put your money into Municipal or State bonds, you collect income, free from all Federal Income Tax. The stability of these recognized premier investments is grounded in the stability of city charters and State constitutions.

An Old Man at Fifty— A Young Man at Seventy

The Remarkable Story of Sanford Bennett, a Former San Francisco Business Man, Who Solved the Problem of Prolonging Youth

By V. O. SCHWAB

THERE is no longer any occasion to go hunting for the spring of Eternal Youth. What Ponce de Leon failed to discover in his world-famous mission, ages ago, has been brought to light right here in staid prosaic America by Sanford Bennett, a former San Francisco business man. He proved it, too, right in his own person. At 50 he was partially bald. At 70 he had a thick head of hair, although it was white. At 50 his eyes were weak. At 70 they were as strong as when he was a child. At 50, he was a worn-out, wrinkled, broken-down, decrepit old man. His cheeks were sunken, his face drawn and haggard, his muscles atrophied. Thirty years of chronic dyspepsia had resulted in catarrh of the stomach, with acid rheumatism periodically adding its agonies. At 70 he was in perfect health, a good deal of an athlete, and as young as the average man of 35. All this he has accomplished by some very simple and gentle exercises which he practiced for about ten minutes before arising in the morning. Yes, many of the exercises are taken in bed, peculiar as this may seem. As Mr. Bennett explains, his case was not one of preserving health, but one of rejuvenating a weak, middle-aged body into a robust old one, and he says what he has accomplished anyone can accomplish by the application of the same methods, and so it would seem. All of which puts the Dr. Osler theory to shame. There isn't room in this article to go into a lengthy description of youth and the prevention of old age. All this he tells himself in a book which he has written, entitled "Old Age—Its Cause and Prevention." This book is a complete history of himself and his experiences, and contains complete instructions for those who wish to put his health and youth-building methods to their own use. It is a book that every man and woman who is desirous of remaining young after passing the fiftieth, sixtieth, seventieth, and as Mr. Bennett believes, the one hundredth mile-stone of life, should read. It is a truly remarkable contribution to health-building literature and is especially valuable because it has been written in a practical manner by a practical man.

Keeping young is simply a matter of knowing how. If you have vitality enough to keep alive, then you have enough to keep young, to keep strong and to be active. Sanford Bennett proves it to you in this book. His message is new. The point of view is unique. The style is fascinating. The pictures are plentiful. The lesson of physical rejuvenation is irresistible. This is a book for every man and woman—young or old.

PARTIAL CONTENTS

Some idea of the field covered by the author may be gained by the following topics: Old Age, Its Cause; How to Prevent It; The Will in Exercising; Exercising in Bed—shown by fifteen pages

of illustration. Sun, Fresh Air and Deep Breathing for Lung Development; The Secret of Good Digestion; Dyspepsia; How I Strengthened my Eyes; The Liver; Internal Cleanliness—how it removes and prevents constipation and its many attendant ills; External Cleanliness; Rheumatism; Varicose Veins in the Legs; The Hair; The Obese Abdomen; The Rejuvenation of the Face, Throat and Neck; The Skin, and many other experience chapters of vital interest.

DON'T SEND ANY MONEY

"Old Age—Its Cause and Prevention," with its 400 pages profusely illustrated and handsomely bound in cloth, contains as much material as many Courses of Instruction selling for $25 or more. But you can secure a copy of this book for only $3. Before committing yourself in any way, however, the publishers will send you "Old Age—Its Cause and Prevention" on approval without deposit. Sanford Bennett's system, as fully described and illustrated in his book, increases nerve force and nerve energy, benefiting every organ of the body—the brain included—by keeping the vertebrae of the spinal column young, flexible, elastic, and in perfect alignment. If, after examination in your own home, you feel you can afford to be without youth and health, send the book back within five days and you will owe nothing. If you decide to keep it, send your check for $3. There are no strings to this offer. No money is required in advance. Merely fill out and mail the coupon and by return post "Old Age—Its Cause and Prevention" will be sent to you at once.

MAIL COUPON

For having solved the problem of prolonging youth during life, the world owes Sanford Bennett a vote of thanks. Of course there are those who will scoff at the idea, but the real wise men and women among those who hear of Sanford Bennett, will most certainly investigate further and at least acquire a knowledge of his methods. This the publishers will allow you to do without cost or obligation, through their "send no money" offer. Mail the coupon below NOW. Address

THE NEW BOOKS

This department will include descriptive notes, with or without brief comments, about books received by The Outlook. Many of the important books will have more extended and critical treatment later

FICTION

Arrow of Gold (The). By Joseph Conrad. Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City.

A romance of the last Spanish Pretender, Carlos of Bourbon, and his plot of about 1875. But this is the mere background for a subtle, intensive study of an elusive woman, Doña Rita, and the strange fascination she exercised over more than one admirer.

Christopher and Columbus. By the Author of "Elizabeth and Her German Garden." Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City.

Twin orphan girls, half English and half German, are shipped off to America in war time by a selfish and contemptible English uncle-in-law. They are ingenious and unworldly, and are taken care of most unconventionally by a sympathetic and honorable American bachelor they run across on shipboard. They nickname themselves Christopher and Columbus because they are about to discover America. Their prattle and innocent attempts to appear dignified and use fine language are amusing. Incidentally there are satirical drives at American snobbery, gossip, and suspicion. The story has not the incisiveness of the author's earlier books.

Love Stories. By Mary Roberts Rinehart. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

Capital short stories—amusing, sprightly, and with an agreeable admixture of romance and real feeling.

Midas and Son. By Stephen McKenna. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

To acquire vast wealth is one thing; to spend it in a large way to solve big world problems is another. The Midas of this story becomes a financial and business magnate with an income of five millions a year, but breaks down just as he is about to tackle the bigger problems. He hopes that his son will rise to the opportunity, but the young man, brilliant as he is, has not the mental and moral stamina needed. He becomes morbid and unhappy because he finds that he no longer loves the woman who deeply loves him, and puts an end to his existence. Mr. McKenna's "Sonia" was a remarkable novel because of its spontaneity and vividness. "Midas and Son" is wanting in just those qualities, but has intellectual ability and good workmanship.

Mystery of the Summer-House (The). By Horace Hutchinson. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

A detective story in which reader, detectives, the jury, and everybody else are ingeniously misled as to the guilt in a murder case by what seems like conclusive circumstantial evidence.

Nurse Benson. By Justin Huntly McCarthy. The John Lane Company, New York.

One can readily see that the play on which this novel is based must have the touch-and-go element of light comedy. The dialogue is clever and witty, and the situations are dramatically consistent, however improbable they might be in real life. All novels founded on plays show obvious marks of the reconstruction, and this is no exception.

Rising of the Tide (The). By Ida M. Tarbell. The Macmillan Company, New York.

A true and faithful picture of a small American town's education by force of events into full patriotism and efficiency against German arrogance, cruelty, and ambition. The incidents are dramatic as well as typical, and the story is decidedly worth reading for itself as well as for its lesson.

ESSAYS AND CRITICISM

Courage Today and Tomorrow. By Jeanette Marks. The Woman's Press, New York.

Essays of brave purpose, fine in feeling and abounding in incitement to resoluteness and cheerfulness in meeting life as it comes.

English Literature. By Roy Bennett Paes. Illustrated. Allyn & Bacon, Boston.

This volume is well planned for making the study of English literature liked by students, if anything can; its comments are lucid and judicious, the extracts are well chosen, and the portraits of authors and the pictures of their habitats are clearly printed and interesting.

Field and Study. By John Burroughs. Houghton Mifflin Company, New York.

A series of disconnected essays, how far reprints from previous periodical publications there is nothing to indicate. Two-thirds of the volume is "Field," one-third "Study." That is as it should be, for Mr. Burroughs is more of an observer than a philosopher. As an accurate observer and a conscientious recorder of what he sees we do not know his superior, but he is a recorder rather than an interpreter. In a single sentence he indicates, perhaps unconsciously, both his excellences and his limitations. "I seem to reach nature," he says, "through my understanding and the desire for knowledge more than through any ethical or purely poetical craving."

MISCELLANEOUS

American Patriotism in Prose and Verse. 1775-1918. Selected and Edited by J. Madison Gathany, A.M. The Macmillan Company, New York.

That there is need for education in patriotism the recent experiences of the United States have proved. The double allegiance of the so-called German-American and the Bolshevist brand of "internationalism," which is really anti-nationalism, are alike repugnant to the patriot, and cannot flourish where patriotism is cultivated. This small, compact volume is therefore distinctly a book for the times. It contains patriotic utterances ranging from Washington to Wilson, from Patrick Henry to Henry van Dyke. It contains informative notes on the selections. This volume is likely to prove useful not only in schools but also in the homes of America, and not only to young people but also to public speakers and others who have occasion to use a reference book on this subject.

Dictionary of 6,000 Phrases (A). Compiled by Edwin Hamlin Carr. G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

Everybody consults a thesaurus now and then to find an elusive synonym; the right phrase is also sometimes as elusive as the right word, and the puzzled letter-writer will find help in his search for it by consulting this book. It is arranged in dictionary fashion so that subjects may be easily found.

Redemption of the Disabled (The). By Garrard Harris. Problems of War and Reconstruction. Illustrated. D. Appleton & Co., New York.

This is at once a manual of general information for the worker who is engaged in the redemption of the disabled and a message of inspiration for the man who thinks he is crippled. It is also a book that might well be read by every citizen who has the welfare of the returned soldier at heart—and that means all of us.

One Food Cost That Stays Down

Still 5 Cents Per 1000 Calories

Quaker Oats—the food of foods—costs you five cents per 1000 calories—the energy measure of food value.

That is one-tenth what meat costs—one-tenth what fish costs—on the average.

Some common foods, on this calory basis, cost from 15 to 20 times oats.

Make Quaker Oats your breakfast. Use this low cost to average up your food cost.

Meats Average 50c
Per 1000 Calories

Two Dishes—One Cent

Two big dishes of Quaker Oats for one cent. Why, a bite of meat costs that.

Then think what a food this is. The oat is the greatest food that grows. It is almost the ideal food—nearly a complete food.

In the needed food elements, including minerals, it shows almost perfect balance.

THE THIRD SYMPHONY

This little sketch illustrating the softening and humanizing influence of a love of music upon the bitter and implacable spirit of an enemy is translated from what is thought by a capable French critic to be one of the few books of distinctive literary merit produced in France during the war. The book is "Vie des Martyrs," by Georges Duhamel. It consists of a series of episodes or incidents described by one who is evidently a surgeon in a hospital for wounded soldiers. This particular sketch in the original, and we hope to some extent in our translation, discloses that characteristic skill of French literary workmanship which succeeds in portraying a personality or a character in a few delicate but telling strokes, none of which is wasted.—THE EDITORS.

Every morning Top Sergeant Spät was carried down on a stretcher into the surgical ward to have his wound dressed, and his entrance brought a sort of chill into the room.

There are some wounded Germans in whom good treatment, suffering, or other influences develop a spirit of resignation and who accept what is done for them with some gratitude. But not so with Spät. For many weeks we had struggled our utmost, first to save him from the grasping and tenacious hands of death, and then to soften and soothe his sufferings. But he never gave the least sign of appreciation nor pronounced the slightest word of thanks. He knew a few words of French, which he used strictly to express his material wants; to say, for example, "A little more absorbent cotton under my foot, Monsieur;" or it might be, "Have I any temperature this morning?" Aside from this he always maintained the same iciness of manner, and the look of his eyes, half screened by their colorless lashes, was always hard and indifferent.

He was clearly a man of intelligence and education, but equally clearly dominated by a living hatred and a rigid sense of his own dignity. He bore his sufferings bravely, and yet at the same time as if his vanity impelled him to repress the most ordinary reactions to sudden pain. I scarcely remember ever to have heard him utter a single groan, which would have seemed so natural to me that it would not in the least have led me to despise him. He merely grunted with the half-uttered "Ugh!" of the woodsman swinging the ax.

One day we had to give him an anesthetic in order to make some incisions in the infected wounds of his leg. His face flushed and he said, almost humbly: "You're not going to amputate it, Monsieur? Don't amputate!"

But on coming out of the ether he resumed his hostile and taciturn manner. Finally I came to believe that his temperament was incapable of expressing anything but cold and passionless animosity. I was undeceived one day by an unexpected incident.

I have a habit, not an uncommon one, I believe, of whistling half under my breath when deeply preoccupied. It may not be an altogether agreeable mannerism, but I often feel the half-unconscious impulse to whistle in this way, especially when I am occupied with some serious and difficult task.

One morning while removing the dressings from Sergeant Spät's wound I fell to whistling in a low tone a melody, scarcely knowing what I was doing or what the melody was. I was thinking only of the man's wounded leg and did not glance at his face. Suddenly I had the curious sensation of feeling that his eyes were fixed upon me with a wholly new expression, and I instantly looked up. An extraordinary thing had come to pass. Suffused and animated with a sort of warmth of contentment, the face of the German was wreathed in smiles. I scarcely recognized it. It was impossible to believe that a man with the traits of character which he habitually displayed could improvise such a smile. It was intimate and full of feeling.

"Tell me, Monsieur," he said in a low voice, "that's something from the 'Third Symphony,' is it not, which you are—how do you say—whistling?—whistling is the word, is it not?"

The first thing I did was to stop whistling. Then I answered, "Yes, it is from the 'Third Symphony,' I believe." Then I hesitated, silent and confused.

Across the abyss between us it seemed as if some unseen power were thrusting a slender bridge.

The miracle lasted for a few seconds, and then again I felt fall upon me the habitual look of Sergeant Spät—the icy, irrevocable shadow of the face of an adversary.

"FOTCHING UP THE BOY"

My household directions for "fotching up the boy" have been short and swift. As I think of them they follow:

By my plan of keeping clean inside just as you would keep clean outside—without comment and simply as a matter of course.

By not hounding him into a corner by too many unnecessary questions.

By never admitting in his presence that a boy is capable of underhanded doing.

By suggesting to him that if he ever felt any superiority to any human being that he go upstairs and take a bath and get over it.

By intimating that no one is ever offended by refined language and decent manners.

By maintaining a great respect for any reserve he may have attained.

By respecting him as an individual.

By realizing that he has his own leadings, intuitions, tastes, and preferences, and that he may be an older, more inspired soul than I am.

By praising him very often.

By leaping upon him and changing conditions on the minute when he slumped.

By everlasting sharing with him the great universal joke.

By understanding when he was bored by Milton's "Comus" and by being thrilled when he chose to read it.

By loving him when he came from the boiler works covered with soot and by continuing my affection when he was in fresh linen.

By accepting at home all the courtesies I wished to have him distribute abroad.

By running along with him in the study of the stars, the garden, politics, the daily news, industrial and social affairs, cookery, and everything from boilers to trench mortars.

By my faith in him. HIS MOTHER.

PRESENT STATUS AND FUTURE OF THE LUMBER INDUSTRY OF THE SOUTH

BY THE HON. W. H. SULLIVAN
Mayor of Bogalusa, Louisiana

IN considering the present status and future of the lumber industry of the Southland it is necessary to bear in mind a little of the history of the Southern lumber industry.

The inherent wealth of the South was, until comparatively a few years ago, little realized by the people throughout the United States. It has a wealth in its climate, its rainfall, its soil for agricultural purposes, its mineral reservoirs, and its vast forests of hard and soft wood—largely Southern pine.

Prior to 1861 the manufacture of lumber and timber from the great forests of the South was largely a local enterprise. Only the large-size timber was removed from the land closely adjacent to streams, and floated down to a few small mills along tide water. The output of these mills being used largely in the local markets, very little was moved either for export or to the large consuming markets in the North.

The products of the forests of the South have now reached and have become necessities in all the lumber-consuming territory of the North, East, Canada, and the markets of the world—they are the product of thousands of sawmills, and it is estimated that in 1912 there were in operation 14,217 sawmills in the States from Virginia to Texas, inclusive. It is estimated that of the 44,000,000,000 feet of lumber produced throughout the United States in 1917 14,500,000,000 feet was Southern pine, and this amount does not include other soft woods and hardwoods manufactured in the South. It can therefore be seen that there has been a great and rapid growth of the lumber industry of the South during a comparatively few years.

There have been marked improvements in the manufacture of lumber, with the view of utilizing all of the tree possible and keeping down the waste to a minimum. In the early days of the Southern pine industry it was customary simply to produce from the log the largest piece of timber possible, the slabs and side boards being burned. This, however, is no longer true of the industry to-day, as it has been found that with the increasing demand not only have the side cuts a value, but moldings, laths, box shooks, and crates are produced from what was formerly wasted.

It was the lumber industry of to-day, largely in the South, that rushed to the aid of our Government in its war programme and furnished material in the space of a few months for the housing of our Army, the building of our wooden fleet, and the supplying of the necessary lumber for the powder plants, docks, wharves, warehouses, and other construction work which was so vital to us in the past great emergency, and it can be said that through the fine organizations of the Southern lumber industry no time was lost in the Government's war activities on account of the need for lumber.

Our industry has been the predominating factor in the building of numerous towns and cities throughout this territory. It is only necessary to visit Bogalusa, Louisiana, where is located the largest sawmill in the world, with a daily capacity of one million feet, to secure an idea of the great activities and constructive work of our industry. In 1906, where stood a virgin pine forest, there is to-day a city of over sixteen thousand people, enjoying all the comforts and advantages of cities of similar size in other communities which have ripened with age in their development.

The lumbermen of the South, realizing to the fullest extent their duties to the individual, the State, and the Nation, are taking a vital interest in the land from which they are removing the forests. They are placing such land as is suitable for agricultural purposes on the market at a very nominal price, and in many instances at their own expense are developing large areas of their cut-over land, establishing experimental farms to determine the best methods of stock raising and farming, and are co-operating to the fullest extent with the Government's Department of Agriculture in working out the problems of the future of the cut-over land areas, and it is safe to predict that in the space of a few years the cut-over lands of the lumber industry of the South will be yielding good homes, employment, and revenue to the agricultural people of the Nation.

There is also another new industry that is being developed from the forest resources of the Southland, namely, the manufacture of paper. As a further means of forest conservation and the saving of waste, there have been erected large mills, the pulp for which is made from what was formerly sawmill and woods waste. Not only is it now unnecessary for the lumbermen to destroy the waste from their lumber operations, but they are also saving in the forests the tops, branches, and other material which was formerly without value.

This new industry in the South will make the "Lumber Cities" permanent, for the land which is not suitable for agriculture can be reforested with quick growth short-leaf pine, so that the source of supply from which pulp can be produced will be to all intents and purposes perpetual.

The future of the lumber industry of the South is one of magnitude, for it will play a prominent part in the building of American homes, which idea is now being fostered and promoted by our Government as one of the vital factors in making the American people home-loving, peace-loving, and contented citizens. It also has its responsibilities in the furnishing of lumber and timber for the rebuilding of the devastated portions of Europe and the supplying of the necessary wood for the industrial expansion in Mexico and the South American countries.

The lumbermen of the South fully realize their responsibilities to their industry and to the Nation, and are striving at all times to protect and develop their people who are depending upon the manufacture of lumber for a livelihood, and the Southland, which has given to the Nation such a valuable resource.

English Prints

and other Dress Cottons

Reg. Trade-Mark

English Prints, the absolutely novel Dress Cottons introduced this season and imported exclusively by James McCutcheon & Company, have met with such instant approval that the large stocks we had laid in were not adequate to meet the demand.

The delightfully quaint designs so popular with our great grandmothers assured their instant popularity, and their high quality at once won the approval of discriminating buyers of Dress Cottons.

English Prints are but one of the novelties to be found in the Dress Goods Department at McCutcheon's.

A large share of the 33rd Street Section of our store is devoted exclusively to Linen and Cotton piece goods of the finer grades. For years we have specialized in these fabrics, and particularly those adapted to women's and children's outer garments and men's shirtings and pajama materials.

Our methods of specialization enable us to maintain a pace far in advance of Fashion's trend. From season to season we are able to procure materials and patterns that are exclusive with us, because of our large purchasing capacity and the fact that we keep in close touch with sources of supply in France, Switzerland, Great Britain and Japan.

BY THE WAY

Rear-Admiral Sims recently paid a friendly tribute to the firemen and stokers of the merchant marine who bravely stuck to their arduous and dangerous work while the German submarines were running amuck. He concluded: "Next time you are aboard a liner and see a greasy member of the fire-room force slip up on deck for a breath of fresh air, touch your hat to him."

A woman came up to the paying teller's window at the First National Bank the other day, so the Portland (Oregon) "Express" says, with a check for fifty dollars which she wished to cash. The teller glanced at the check, and, fingering his greenbacks, asked in his pleasantest tones: "What denomination, madam?" "Lutheran," replied the woman; "what are you?"

Lodgings in Paris are hard to get and command a premium. A cartoon in "Pêle Mêle" represents a boulevardier, hat in hand, approaching an old and extremely unattractive janitress with this proposition: "See here, Mme. la Concierge, if you get me a room, I'll give you two hundred francs, and, besides, a Christmas present of five hundred francs, and—" "But, M'sieur, I have received from another applicant an offer of marriage if I get lodgings for him!"

The ignorance of some elements of the rising generation as to the Bible is often deplored; but occasionally the young men of to-day display an aptness of comment on Scriptural subjects that is gratifying. Here is an example quoted by a subscriber: The young artilleryman had said that Germany was a bully and a coward and carried her defeat in her make-up. The Biblical commentator instanced, as proof of this, Goliath in full armor parading up and down and cursing the Israelites, while the "young and inexperienced" David slew him with a smooth stone from the brook. To this the artilleryman rejoined: "Don't believe for a moment that David was ignorant or inexperienced. He knew perfectly the value of the projectile. He knew that armor and 'a spear with a shaft like a weaver's beam' were clumsy and useless offensives against well-selected and well-aimed projectiles!"

"Now, Willie," said the teacher, as reported in "Blighty," "what is the meaning of the word transparent?" Willie: "Something you can see through." "Right. Now give an example." "A ladder."

The clergyman who has humor and a knowledge of human nature sometimes finds it better to fall in with rough talk rather than to give a soft answer. Such was the case with the bishop, as reported in an English paper, who asked a miner why he never went to church. "Why, you see, sir, it's like this," was the reply; "the first time I went to church they threw water in my face, and the second time they tied me to a woman I've had to keep ever since." The bishop smiled grimly. "And the third time you go," he said, "they'll throw dirt on you."

Apocryphos of that form of the drama whose action largely consists in "soaking 'em one," the Long Island City "Star" says: "Now that Charlie Chaplin is married, just think what may happen when the bride essays her first custard pie!"

Harry Rowson, an English film manager, was born in England and served his coun-

"An invaluable contribution to the History of the Time."

—Public Ledger.

EX-PRESIDENT TAFT says: "Dr. Lewis is a teacher and publicist of wide experience and intimate knowledge of his subject, a man of high character and discrimination with whom this history is a labor of love. He has written an impartial, nonpartisan history of this great man, whom he knew personally and with whom he deeply sympathized."

try in the war. His name was originally Rosenbaum. An English paper, learning this fact, accused him of being a German. His parents, however, were Russian, though their name, Rosenbaum, had a Germanic coloring. The case came into the courts and the editor had to acknowledge his mistake and publicly apologize. It is unsafe to jump to conclusions about a man's nationality from the sound of his name, as the following paragraph also shows.

An Associated Press correspondent, R. C. Long, gives in a recent book a graphic description of the famous Fortress of St. Peter and St. Paul, "the Bastille of Petrograd," once used to imprison revolutionists, later to intern aristocrats. One of the prisoners he interviewed was General Rennenkampf, who was associated with General Samsonoff in the disastrous battle of Tannenberg. Asked what his offenses were, Rennenkampf answered, "Samsonoff's defeat and my own German name." But his Teutonic sympathies were perhaps shown in this bitter remark: "I am told that the cause of Russia's defeat is that three-quarters of her officers are Germans; the real cause is that three-quarters of them are Russians."

Makaroff, the former Russian Minister of the Interior, was also a prisoner in the grim Fortress, and made a curious comment on the situation, as reported by Mr. Long: "He denounced the Revolution and prophesied that it would perish at the hands of extreme Democracy. 'The Government of the Czar,' he said, 'was wholly vicious; but I supported it as a patriotic man, and did nothing to aggravate its badness. I was honestly convinced that all possible Russian governments must be bad.' Prison and Terror, he affirmed, had been the only means respectively of keeping order and of correcting despotism, since Tartar days; and they would continue so to the end."

A British tourist in devastated France is pictured in "Punch" as being "floored" by the educated Chinese head of a force of laborers doing reconstruction work. The dialogue follows:

British visitor (using pidgin English to supposed laborer): "John Chinaman likee muchee dleease allee samee English soldier."

Chinaman: "Well, sir, I don't concern myself much about uniform. Actually I'm a journalist and only came here for the experience."

The ups and downs of auction sales were interestingly shown in Paris lately, when two designs for ceilings by the Venetian artist Tiepolo were sold for $8,200; they had been bought by a dealer within recent years for $30. A Corot, "The Forum Seen from the Gardens of the Farnese Palace," brought $11,400; at the Corot sale in 1875 it went for $520.

A Simple Way to Remove Stomach Trouble

Results in 48 Hours

By Lamar K. Tuttle, D.O., M.D.

Dr. Lamar K. Tuttle, of New York City, is a graduate of both the osteopathic and regular schools of medicine and ranks high in his profession. He has been in active practice for the past fifteen years, and is consulted by many of the most prominent men and women in America. He is a member of the A. M. A. A. O. A., N. Y. O. S., etc. We feel honored to have a physician of Dr. Tuttle's high standing consent to give his views so freely.

AN old friend of mine dropped in to see me some months ago. When we had finished talking over old times he said, "Doctor, I want to have a straight talk with you about my health, and I want you to tell me the truth."

Like many a business man, he was beginning to feel severe doubts about his state of health. He had nothing particularly the matter with him, but he felt that his old-time energy and staying powers were slipping away. He lacked his former enthusiasm; the edge seemed to have been taken off his ability to enjoy things; headaches, pains in the eyes, in the back of the head and the stomach, bothered him all too frequently.

He had all sorts of other symptoms which, while they quickly "wore off," sufficed to rob him of his ability to get things done, and to make him think seriously about his state of health. His case was typical of that of the everyday man and woman. Thousands have just the same symptoms, and they worry and suffer just as he worried and suffered.

I gave him some advice. A few months later he dropped in to see me again—an altogether different-looking man this time. He had added about twenty pounds to his weight; his skin and his eyes were clearer, and he had all of the "snap" and "sparkle" of his younger days. With great delight he told me that he felt like a new man. Gone were the old aches and pains, the stomach trouble, the depressed feelings, and the "off" days. In their place were vigorous health, boundless enthusiasm and an almost tireless capacity for work.

How was this remarkable change brought about? Well, the best way is for me to talk to you just as I talked to him when he first came to me. I opened my talk this way:

"Recently I was a guest at a banquet in New York City given in honor of a prominent physician. At the conclusion of the banquet, the guest of the evening was called upon to speak. He held up a large bowl and explained that as each course had been served he had placed a part of it in the bowl.

Then, with a sweep of the hand, he removed the cover and asked us to look closely upon its contents. One look was sufficient! The contents of the bowl were an affront to sight, smell and taste! And then when the physician reminded us that at that very moment our stomachs were struggling with just such an awful mess, our feelings can well be imagined!

The physician went on to tell us that most of our ailments—occasional or chronic—come from incorrect eating, of which he had just shown such a striking example.

It is what we put in our stomach, not our faithful stomach, that is to blame for many of the ailments popularly attributed to stomach trouble. "Stomach trouble" is usually food trouble—the stomach is rebelling against the food we are forcing into it.

The rapid return to health of a sufferer from so-called chronic disease, who applies the simple and easily acquired principles of correct eating, is often startling.

Good health, in fact life itself, is dependent upon the amount and quality of the air we breathe—the water we drink and the food we eat. We cannot always command fresh pure air, but we can control what we put in our stomachs.

Blood has been aptly called the "stream of life." It is the medium whereby our tissues receive food and tissue waste is removed. Oxygen—an element essential to tissue life—is drawn from the air we breathe and carried by the blood to the body tissues. The food we eat contains elements just as essential as oxygen to body health and life.

In your stomach the food is prepared for body building by a chemical process exact, complete and simple.

The special senses, taste, smell, and to a certain degree sight, act as special guardians for the stomach. Certain substances we cannot—must not eat. When these substances are offered as food either our taste finds them unwelcome, or our sense of smell protests and we reject the article for food, even though it be attractive to the eye. Good and proper food must therefore appeal to our taste and smell.

But there are ways known to cookery of fooling our stomach guardians. Our sense of taste is drugged with rich sauces and condiments; the aroma of skillfully combined food articles pleases the sense of smell, and the decorative art delights the eye. This leads us to force upon a helpless stomach food combinations that when acted upon chemically by the stomach laboratory, result in body poisoning. The intestines labor unsuccessfully with quantities of waste and fermentation and even putrefaction ensue. The blood stream becomes loaded—actually polluted—with irritants and toxins; the entire body system is affected and before long the signs and symptoms of disease are manifest.

These symptoms are grouped and classified and called—as the case may be—"rheumatism"—"hardening of the arteries"—"heart trouble"—"acid stomach," etc. They may all come from one thing—food poisoning. The symptoms of food poisoning are too numerous to mention here—the so-called diseases traceable directly to this cause are legion. The weariness of the "tired business man" can often be directly traced to incorrect eating.

The oft-repeated complaint of the individual apparently in good health who complains that his night's sleep benefits him but little, inasmuch as he awakens in the morning as "tired as when he went to bed," is so familiar to us all as to occasion little if any interest. The sufferer attributes his unrefreshing sleep to overwork—lack of exercise—or "nervousness." This condition is often called by a high-sounding name, "Neurasthenia," and the patient given a prescription for a drug for his poor stomach to struggle with. A large percentage of these cases are victims of food poisons—the direct result of incorrect eating.

Another large group of unfortunates are those who suffer frequent attacks of so-called bilious headaches—attacks which are painful and distressing beyond words. In many cases they are caused by a laboring overworked liver and a poisoned intestinal tract—the result of faulty food combinations.

The victim of chronic stomach hyperacidity is surely an object of pity. This condition breeds pessimism, and no wonder! With the physical and mental suffering it entails—plus the recurring disappointments experienced by many in search of a cure—pessimism on the part of the sufferer surely is excusable.

In most cases both the doctor and the patient direct most of their attention to the stomach. The stomach in many cases is doing the best possible. Incorrect eating resulting in stomach abuse, is the first cause. The cure can be found in correct eating—proper stomach use. Though many régimes of special diet have been tried in vain, I have known mastery and application of the principles of correct eating to effect a cure. The self-healing and self-restoring powers of the human machine, when structurally correct, are almost limitless.

It is possible, by means of properly combining the food we eat, for us actually to eat our way to health. We need not go on a meagre diet, nor deprive ourselves of the food we like. We can still go on eating the usual foods, but we must know how to properly combine them.

Of those who have successfully specialized in dietetics, none rank higher than Eugene Christian. After much painstaking experimentation with food chemistry, plus a wide knowledge gained in the field of practice of his specialty, he is eminently qualified to speak as an authority on what a man should put in his stomach as food.

Eugene Christian has written a series of Little Lessons in Corrective Eating, 24 in number. The results of his experiments, experience and learning, are in these lessons. They contain the secret of correct eating. Through them thousands have found the key to health and happiness. These lessons are stripped of all technicalities. They give you definite facts, in plain everyday language. They tell you exactly what to eat in order to maintain perfect health; and also how to cure many distressing ailments.

If you suffer from stomach hyperacidity, there are good probabilities that within forty-eight hours after you apply Eugene Christian's teachings, you will know stomach comfort. The knowledge gained from these lessons will prove of benefit to the sufferer from any ailment. To the well they insure a reasonable means of maintaining health. You will learn to use your stomach—not abuse it. The writer has been in active practice during the greater part of the past fifteen years and bases his opinions on the evil effects of incorrect eating and the curative results of correct eating on experiences with hundreds of cases.

Stomach abuse due to incorrect eating is one of the most frequent causes of disease in man. Mental efficiency is greatly dependent upon physical well-being, and business success is dependent upon both. A mind and body drugged by poisons generated from the fermenting, putrefying end products of wrongly combined food elements can neither manifest efficiency nor know the true meaning of health, contentment or happiness.

WITH Eugene Christian's Little Lessons in Corrective Eating at hand it is just as though you were in personal contact with the great food specialist, because every possible point is so thoroughly covered that you can scarcely think of a question which isn't answered. You can start eating the very things that will produce the increased physical and mental energy you are seeking the day you receive the lessons, and you will find that you secure results with the first meal. This, of course, does not mean that complicated illnesses can be removed at one meal, but it does mean that real results can nearly always be seen in 48 hours or less.

If you would like to examine these 24 Little Lessons in Corrective Eating, simply write the Corrective Eating Society, Department 155, 443 Fourth Avenue, New York City. It is not necessary to enclose any money with your request. Merely ask them to send the lessons on five days' trial with the understanding that you will either return them within that time or remit $3.00, the small fee asked.

The reason why the Society is willing to send the lessons on free examination, without money in advance, is because they want to remove every obstacle to putting this knowledge in the hands of the many interested people as soon as possible, knowing full well that a test of some of the menus in the lessons themselves is more convincing than anything that can possibly be said about them.

Send no money. Merely mail the coupon below or write a letter and the Little Lessons will reach you by return mail.

Corrective Eating Society, Inc.,

Dept. 155, 443 Fourth Ave., New York City

You may send me prepaid a copy of Corrective Eating in 24 Lessons. I will either return them to you within five days after receipt or send you $3.

A picture and a letter from one of the doughboys in the Army of Occupation

Wittlich, Germany, Jan. 2nd, 1919.
 Adv. Manager, The Procter & Gamble Co.,
 Cincinnati, Ohio

Dear Sir:

I am sending under separate cover a drawing suitable for an Ivory Soap advertisement.

This drawing is based on an occurrence which was too good for me to let slip by. One of the boys got two bars of Ivory in his 3x4x9 Christmas box and his attitude and joy in receiving it, is by no means exaggerated in the drawing. Ivory leaves a feeling of freshness and cleanliness that can't be equaled. We were able to get it at a commissary down in the Vosges about three months ago, but haven't seen any since.

The background of the drawing will picture somewhat the comfort in which the Army of Occupation is now living. Our quarters are in a former seminary and we have all the conveniences of a college dormitory.

Though the drawing is done on the only paper available and not on the usual 30 x 40 illustration board you are accustomed to see, I'm sure it will reproduce well. An advertisement could be written around it for next Christmas or it can be used in the near future, as a good many of us shall remain here for a long time and boxes will come as long as any of us remain.

Yours very truly,

Sgt. George W. Straub,

Co. C, 326 F. Sig. Ba., American E. F.,

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

ON Tuesday, May 20, Congress listened to the reading of President Wilson's Message. It was notable as being the first ever sent by an American President by cable from a foreign country and as being also the first Message from President Wilson at the opening of Congress which he has not delivered in person.

The Message deals almost entirely with domestic affairs, the President merely expressing the hope that he will soon be at his post in Washington to report upon the Peace Conference and declaring that "it still seems to be my duty to take part in the counsels of the Peace Conference and contribute what I can to the solution of the innumerable questions to whose settlement it has had to address itself; for they are questions which affect the peace of the whole world, and from them, therefore, the United States cannot stand apart." On domestic affairs Mr. Wilson makes many suggestions and recommendations. Naturally he refers to the appropriations necessary for Government maintenance and the fulfillment of our National engagements, appropriations which were not passed by the previous Congress. This need he speaks of as critical. The labor question receives large attention and stress, but the recommendations are rather as to the spirit of the legislation than as to specific requirements. Thus the President says:

The object of all reform in this essential matter must be the genuine democratization of industry, based upon a full recognition of the right of those who work, in whatever rank, to participate in some organic way in every decision which directly affects their welfare or the part they are to play in industry.

At just this time special interest has been felt in what the President might say as to the prohibiting of the manufacture and sale of wines and beers under the present war measure. He believes that it is now safe to remove that ban, but that he has not legal authority to do so without new legislation, for which accordingly he asks. As to woman suffrage, he declares that the passing of the amendment is called for by "every consideration of justice and of public advantage."

Other points of large interest touched upon in the Message are: Assisting returned soldiers in the most liberal spirit to enter into the work of the country, with special recommendation of Secretary Lane's plan as to the undeveloped lands and the soldiers; the extending of our merchant shipping system; the reconstitution of the Federal tax system to make it more simple and less burdensome; the adjustment of the "mainstays" of taxation, namely, the income tax, the excess profits tax, and the estate tax—all of which should be made to yield adequate returns without burdening the taxpayers grievously; the returning of the railways and telegraphs and telephones as soon as it can be done, with the statement that the railways will be handed over to their owners at the end of the calendar year; tariff revision under the new international conditions, with special attention to dyestuffs and chemical manufactures.

There is a good deal in this Message, and particularly the passages regarding prohibition and regarding the return of the railway and wire systems, that indicates new trends of action which the Democratic minority in Congress will doubtless follow if they continue to accept the lead of the President as to National legislation.

MISREPRESENTATION

One of the first bills to be introduced in the Sixty-sixth Congress is a measure providing that hereafter each new Congress shall not wait nearly thirteen months before it assembles, but shall meet on March 4 following election.

This is a very conservative, indeed an excessively cautious, attempt to improve a condition that is now undemocratic and dangerous.

At present we tolerate in America unrepresentative government. A man is elected President in November. The President whom he displaces nevertheless remains in office for four months. A man is elected to Congress. In the ordinary course of affairs the man whom he displaces still remains, with power to legislate, for four months, and the man whom the people have chosen in his place cannot take his seat, unless the President wills it, until the last month of the year after which he has been elected.

The situation which has arisen this year has called public attention to this state of affairs. In the elections last November the people withdrew their support from the Democratic party in Congress and gave it to the Republican party. Nevertheless there was no change. Because the last Congress was prevented by the tactics of what was nominally and legally the minority party (though not the minority party according to the people's will) from providing necessary funds for the Government, the President was forced to call the new Congress into special session. Otherwise the representatives whom the people elected last November would not have been able to take their seats and carry out the people's will until next December.

This is not the fault of the Constitution. To remedy this state of affairs it is not necessary to go to the trouble of a Constitutional amendment. All that needs to be done is for Congress to enact a law. There is no real reason why the interval between the election and the inauguration of the President or the sitting of Congress should be more than a month. At the furthest the new Congress should take its seat on the first of January, and the new President should begin his term of office on the first of January, following election.

The measure which Mr. McArthur has introduced and which has, it is said, a fair chance of rapid enactment, is but a step in the right direction.

This necessary reform has been the subject of discussion for years. Not only did we point this matter out on March 19, when we said, "Congress, by law under the Constitution, can change the date of the first session of Congress to the 1st of January next following election day," but we have urged the same reform before. In March, 1902, we raised this question. In December, 1905, we said: "The Congress elected in November should assemble in the following December, not in the year following—that is, one month, not thirteen months, after the election." And again, in February, 1910, we said: "By all means let Inauguration Day be changed; but let it be put back from the 4th of March to the 1st of December."

We hope not only that Mr. McArthur's bill will be enacted, but that it will be followed by agitation for further legislation setting both the Presidential inauguration and the first session of each new Congress not later than the first of January, and preferably the first week in December.

WHAT BEER IS ILLEGAL?

The new National war-time prohibition law prohibits the manufacture, importation, or sale, not of any kind of beer, but only of beer that is in fact intoxicating. This has been established by the decision of Judge A. N. Hand in the United States District Court in New York. It remains to be established what beer is intoxicating and what is not.

Though the decision was in a case brought by brewers, and therefore applies directly to the manufacture of beer, the decision would in effect apply also to wine.

As in almost all legal cases, the process by which this decision was reached seems rather complicated to the ordinary man. It came about in this way. Last November Congress passed an act "for the purpose of conserving the man power of the Nation and to increase efficiency in the production of arms, munitions, ships, food, and clothing for the Army and Navy." To this end the act prohibits the manufacture of "beer, wine or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors for beverage purposes" on and after May 1, and the sale of such beverages on and after July 1.

This act must not be confused with the law and the Presidential proclamations limiting or permitting the use of grain in the making of liquors. The act of November 21, 1918, was not a grain conservation measure. It was a measure distinctly for the conservation of man power in industry.

This act, moreover, must not be confused with the Prohibition Amendment to the Constitution. This act was purely a war measure, and its validity depends upon the war power of Congress.

When the 1st of May came, certain brewers continued to brew beer containing 2.75 per cent of alcohol. Expecting prosecution, these brewers applied to the Court for an injunction to restrain the Federal officers from interfering with the manufacture of that beer. The Federal Government, represented by the United States District Attorney, asked to have the brewers' plea for an injunction dismissed on two grounds: first, that the complainants had no right to bring a suit against the United States Attorney; and, second, that the statute prohibited the complainants from brewing any beer, whether it contained 2.75 per cent alcohol or not. Judge Hand decided that the United States Attorney could be enjoined. He also decided that the statute did not prohibit the manufacture of all beer, but only beer that is intoxicating, and therefore that the brewers had a right to ask for an injunction if they could show that the beer they were making was not intoxicating.

Judge Hand distinctly said that in this particular action the question whether beer having 2.75 per cent alcohol is intoxicating was not before him for decision. That is a question which remains to be settled.

That question ought not to be settled by juries nor by the courts. If the question were submitted to juries, there would be varying verdicts, and no man would know in advance of being tried what the law really meant or what his rights were. If the question were left to the courts, there would be more uniformity, but there might be as many definitions as there are States, since the enforcement of law, when prohibition becomes a Constitutional provision, will be left to both the States and to the Federal Government. The question ought to be settled by Congressional enactment. Two definitions seem to be possible; one stating the maximum percentage of alcohol allowable; the other defining as intoxicating any product of fermentation or distillation. Whatever the definition may be, it ought to be clear and definite.

Even if the war-time prohibition law is repealed or amended (as the President urges), or expires with the end of the war emergency, the same question of defining the word "intoxicating" will have to be settled in interpreting and enforcing the Eighteenth Amendment when that comes into force. It is conceivable that there might be one definition to apply to the whole Nation, and (since the States then will have concurrent jurisdiction in enforcing prohibition) stricter definitions adopted by States that want them stricter.

WILL GERMANY SIGN?

No treaty drawn up by the Allied Powers would have been received by Germany with approval. The fact, therefore, that the Germans are complaining against the terms of the treaty that has been presented to them is not in the least surprising. Ebert, the German President, who may be called a chosen successor to the Kaiser, has declared publicly that Germany would "never sign the peace terms." He has characterized them as the "product of the enemies' revengeful hysteria." The German newspapers complain that Germany was hoodwinked into agreeing to a cessation of hostilities by a promise that the peace would be in accordance with President Wilson's Fourteen Points, and then has been subjected to the imposition of conditions that belie the promise made. The Germans complain that Germany is not admitted as an equal among peoples into the League of Nations; that the payments which she is called upon to make in reparation for the damage she has done will subject her to economic servitude; that she is called upon to disarm, while the nations she has fought retain their weapons, their armies, and their navies; that territory occupied by Germans has been taken from them; that she is deprived of her colonies and is not allowed to become a mandatory Power like France and England; that by the taking away of her merchant marine, men accustomed to the sea will be thrown out of employment. In brief, Germany feels injured in not being treated as a civilized Power on equal terms with the nations against which she has made war.

Meetings have been held in various parts of Germany protesting against the Treaty. Some of these meetings, held by German Socialists, appeal to the French Socialists and the Socialists of other countries of the Allies. Their protest is based upon the common interest of the workers in all parts of the world. There is fertile ground in the minds of a certain type of internationalist in England, France, Belgium, and Italy, and even in the United States, in which this German seed may sprout. The basis of all these appeals is the assumption that both sides in the World War were fighting for the same thing, that all the nations are virtually equally guilty, and that hostilities ceased by mutual agreement. Certainly what the Germans have been saying, and what some of their sympathizers have said also, could not have been said if the armistice had been the result of what was obviously to their minds an unconditional surrender.

Of course Germany is not helping her case with the great majority of people by her complaints. It is reported that the Allies in answering the German contentions tried to show Germany that she has got to bear her share at least of the economic losses and burdens that have resulted from the war she has made, and that they tried to get into the heads of the Germans that Germany's complaint concerning the loss of her merchant marine because it will throw people out of work is preposterous, in view of the fact that the illegal and murderous attacks of the German submarine have had the unfortunate effect of throwing seamen out of work throughout the world.

It seems to be generally assumed that the Germans, after using every means to ameliorate the terms, will sign the Treaty. The German Government is undoubtedly put into an extremely difficult position. If it approves the signing of the Treaty, it will be accused of consenting to bondage. If it declines to sign, it will be accused of opening the whole country to occupation by foreign troops and to administration by foreign rulers. It is a predicament, however, that is the inevitable consequence of the crime which the German Imperial Government, with the consent and support of the German people, committed. One American doughboy has made a comment upon the Peace Treaty that is terse and to the point. The staff correspondent of the New York "Globe" interviewed some Americans who fought the Germans, and asked them what they thought of the Treaty. And this is one of the comments he received: "I don't see how they can sign this thing, and yet I have a feeling that it isn't altogether strict enough, in some things. They ought to make the Heinies build up every house they destroyed in France, and they ought to put their officers at the work, with buck privates superintending the job."

LUDENDORFF SPEAKS

If any Americans think or imagine that the German believers in militarism have been disillusioned by the outcome of the war, it is because it is hard for an American to appreciate the German military man's state of mind. Whether Americans understand that state of mind or not, however, it is important that they should realize that it still is a menace. As a means to this end, service has been rendered by the New York "Evening Post" in printing an interview by Charles Victor, its foreign correspondent, with Field-Marshal von Ludendorff.

"The man who lost the greatest war in the world's history," writes Mr. Victor, "is the embodiment of senseless, brutal force. . . . His square, reddish face would be handsome except for the expression of pugnacity and brutal cynicism which rarely leaves it." In summing up at the outset what this German general said Mr. Victor writes: "He refused to concede that the entry of America into the war made the slightest difference, and stubbornly held to the conviction that except for the revolution Germany would have won the war."

After refusing to be interviewed, beyond giving out a printed statement that he stood aloof from any movement among the German people and was living the life of a private citizen, writing his book, he was drawn into a statement on the military advantage of tanks. He rejected as nonsense the opinion that the materials used in the construction of U-boats should have been used for tanks, tanks, and more tanks, and then added: "U-boats were absolutely necessary. They brought England to the verge of economic collapse."

"But," the "Evening Post's" correspondent intervened, "they also brought America into the war."

"Ha! America would have come in anyway," he said, angrily.

When he denied that America's entrance made any difference in the result, Mr. Victor exclaimed, "Two millions of troops, and no difference?"

"They were not sufficiently trained," he said, with a stubborn shake of the head. "You cannot create an army in six months. Individually the American soldier is a brave, sturdy fellow (stammer Kerl), but he could not be a match for our seasoned troops."

Later in the interview Mr. Victor asked whether Germany would not be better off now that her militarism is dead. The interview continued:

Here came another accession of temper. "Militarism, nonsense! What is militarism? What do you understand 'militarism' to be?"

"I understand it to be a national policy," I said in my best scientific German, "which follows the dictates of military strategy rather than the cultivation of good international relations. Don't you think that in this sense Germany was more militaristic than France or England?"

"No," he shot back. "Who do you think made Germany's policy before the war?"

"We think the Kaiser did."

"No. Bethmann Hollweg, and more flabby policy could not be imagined," he added, with an expression of undisguised disgust. "Not a single military man had any influence. It would have been better if the soldiers had had something to say. What is it that made Germany great and prosperous? The strong Government (straffe Regierung) of former years. Militarism! Certainly France was more militaristic than we. It was France that cultivated the revenge idea, that taught its children that 'Alsace-Lorraine is French.'"

"Is it your idea, then, that the war would not have come if soldiers had guided Germany's policy?"

"Perhaps not. The war was not necessary. It was necessary for us because it was forced on us."

"You admit, then, that it would have been better if it had not come—for humanity . . ."

"Humanity!" he broke in, furiously; "America came into the war to make money and you Americans talk to me of humanity? No, I have no faith in 'humanity.'" At the outset of the interview he was peevish; now he was fighting mad.

"But supposing Germany had won. . ."

This restored his equilibrium, and the first smile flitted across his stern bulldog face. "That," he grinned, "would have been beautiful."

Such a statement is valuable because it reminds us that the danger of Germany to the world was not primarily in her guns or her other resources, nor even in her alleged efficiency; but it was in her state of mind. The armistice did not change that state of mind. We have abundant proof of that. This utterance of Ludendorff, like the utterances of Erzberger, Ebert, and others in Germany, should keep the rest of the world on guard. It is no time to relax vigilance.

DAVID HUMMELL GREER

One of the great religious leaders of the United States died last week. His distinction was not in the office he held, as the Protestant Episcopal Bishop of New York, but in the service he rendered. It was not because he exercised great authority that he will be remembered, but because he served his fellow-men with so great devotion.

Born in 1844, in Wheeling, West Virginia, educated at Washington and Jefferson College, Kenyon College, and the Seminary at Gambier, David Hummell Greer began his ministry as a rector in Clarksburg, West Virginia, going from there to Covington, Kentucky, and three years later to Providence, Rhode Island, and from there to New York. From 1888, for sixteen years, he was rector of St. Bartholomew's, and then became Bishop Coadjutor, and, on Bishop Potter's death, Bishop of New York.

He was a preacher of power, and, particularly in his earlier career as rector of St. Bartholomew's, his preaching had great virility. In later years, weighed down by the responsibilities of an onerous administrative office, he undoubtedly felt the limitations which other men have felt in the same office. Phillips Brooks felt them when he became Bishop of Massachusetts. Moreover, the world war oppressed his soul and gave him distress because of the magnitude of human suffering it inflicted. And yet this man, who in later years spoke so much in deploring strife, preached, as one member of the staff of The Outlook can testify, during the Spanish War on the Christian use of passion—a memorable sermon showing how combativeness can be made holy and righteous by a righteous and holy cause.

What Bishop David Hummell Greer, however, will be remembered for is, primarily, his contribution to the great movement, characteristic of our time, of infusing the Christian spirit into what is known as social service. In 1888 he was called to two churches. Of the two he chose the one where there were empty pews to fill and where there was the harder work to do. At that time St. Bartholomew's had not the popularity and the attendance that it gained under his ministry. When he left it, it had not only a congregation consisting of many who were rich and resourceful, but a record of human service that is matched by but few churches in this country. Its great parish house in East Forty-second Street occupies almost an entire city block.

There are a clinic and dispensary, clubs for boys and girls, for men and women, a gymnasium, an employment bureau, a fresh-air mission which conducts a farm and vacation home in Connecticut, a penny provident fund, a rescue mission, a tailor shop, a sewing school, a kindergarten, a bureau for the distribution of coal and wood, a boys' brigade, a training school, and other organizations, all serving a great population, or, rather, providing means by which this great population can find access to the things that men and women need to make life decent and strong and humane.

As Bishop, Dr. Greer had not the characteristics of the traditional, conventional ecclesiastic. He did not wear the dress of his office as he moved about among men. He was not a party man. Neither the High Church nor the Low Church nor the Broad Church could claim that he was its advocate, though all his tendency and influence were for breadth. It was characteristic of him to be an advocate of every measure that would make his own communion accessible to all Christians, and at the same time to be one of the chief builders of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, which is a distinctly ecclesiastical monument in a rather commercially inclined city. He had faith in his fellow-men. He undertook big things because he believed in the capacity of men and women to carry them through to fulfillment. It can be fairly said of him that because of his character it was not the bishopric that honored him so much as he that honored the bishopric.

BOY SCOUT WEEK

The Nation-wide campaign to be carried on during the week of June 8-14 for the Boy Scout movement is part of a larger and continuous effort to make the Boy Scouts stronger by arousing the interest of the whole community. The Boy Scouts have done wonders. It is possible for them to do still greater wonders if the individual citizens everywhere stand back of the organization, not merely with money support, but with intelligent advice and direct co-operation. Even on the financial side the effort of Boy Scout Week is not so much to get money into the treasury for immediate needs as it is to secure pledges of regular and wise support.

It is said that there are about ten million boys in the country between the ages of twelve and twenty-one. As only about a third of a million are now enrolled in the Boy Scouts, it is evident that there is boundless room for growth. It is hoped that this campaign will add a million associate members and will be a permanent and valuable increase in the moral and personal support which the organization needs and should have.

The training of our boys through the Boy Scouts organization, largely through outdoor exercise and nature study, has already brought forth notable results in good citizenship and helpfulness. The Boy Scouts, for instance, in the first four Liberty loans obtained subscriptions amounting to over $275,000,000, although their canvassing could follow only after the regular Loan Committees had covered the ground pretty thoroughly; the boys have sold over $50,000,000 worth of War Stamps; they did a peculiarly valuable war service in locating standing walnut trees, much needed for rifle stocks; they co-operated in garden work, in collecting fruit pits for gas masks, gathering books, distributing Government literature, and in many other ways. They have now adopted as a peace cry, "The war is over, but our work is not."

The thing the Boy Scouts need most is not enthusiasm among the boys, for that is abundant, but intelligent aid in organizing and managing the branches everywhere and in spreading the knowledge of the movement among all American citizens. President Wilson in his proclamation of Boy Scout Week recognizes this when he recommends that "in every community a Citizens' Committee under the leadership of a National Citizens' Committee be organized to co-operate in carrying out a programme for a definite recognition of the effective services rendered by the Boy Scouts of America; for a survey of the facts relating to the boyhood of each community, in order that with the co-operation of churches, schools, and other organizations definitely engaged in work for boys, adequate provision may be made for extending the Boy Scout programme to a larger proportion of American boyhood."

THE SALVATION ARMY DRIVE

What the Salvation Army did in France every soldier knows. What it has done and is doing at home is to use the same human, friendly, cheerful methods that endeared it to the soldier in furnishing comfort, help, sympathy, to those who sorely need them. A "drive" for $13,000,000 for Home Service may sound like a huge undertaking, but a glance at some of the records of things done the last year, entirely outside of the splendid service with soldiers and sailors, shows that the work is on an enormous scale—and every one knows that the Salvation Army does not waste money. Thus the Army's hotels gave beds to 1,656,528 persons, the industrial homes gave beds to 1,742,815 persons, 43,345 prisoners were visited, work was furnished to 100,000 persons, and there are hundreds of rescue homes, hospitals, slum settlements, and other centers of social service. The Salvation Army has nearly a thousand separate corps and outposts in the United States, and maintains halls and headquarters in every part of the country. Its work is unselfish, warm-hearted, and its help is given to men and women of every race and religion. It goes straight to the people, and it has a place of its own in the hearts of the people.

The other day at the great mass-meeting of the Salvation Army in New York a Catholic prelate pronounced the invocation and a Jewish rabbi the benediction. And the audience cheered when ex-Governor Whitman declared that "when the call to war came, there was no lack of preparedness in this Army," and when Vice-President Marshall said of their service abroad that he "did not know how they did it—but they did it."

Bishop Luther B. Wilson summarized the universal feeling when he said: "The Salvation Army, when the great opportunity came upon the field of battle and under the fierceness of the shell fire there, did just what it has been seeking to do all the years on every side, all over seas, all around the world. It sought to give bread and it sought to give God." If the spontaneous enthusiasm of that meeting was a sample of America's enthusiasm for the Salvation Army, their call for support will be amply and generously answered.

AN AMERICAN MINSTREL

Some day, when ragtime and kindred forms of music become recognized as distinctive and valuable material for the artist, such a man as the Negro band leader James Europe, who was murdered the other day, will be considered as more than a mere entertainer.

A few years ago James Europe came to New York, unknown. When he died he had made a name for himself in France and England as well as in America. He started his career with a small band or orchestra that grew into popularity because of its inspiring power in playing dance music. James Europe's band was in great demand for dances. At that time Mr. and Mrs. Vernon Castle were all the rage, and the dances that they introduced and made popular fitted the kind of music that Europe's band could play to perfection. There was a sort of partnership between Europe and the Castles.

It so happened that there was a fire in the Negro quarter up in the northern part of New York City, and most of the Negro "talent" were assembled to give an entertainment to raise funds for relief, and Europe's band was the chief attraction. There were very few white people in the audience, and not a white person on the stage until the end, and then it was that the Castles came on and gave an exhibition of dancing. It was partly their expression of appreciation for what Europe's band had done to make their art popular. After America went into the war, James Europe became a bandmaster in the American Army and acquired the grade of Lieutenant. His Negro band became renowned throughout the A. E. F., and people of distinction in France and England gave it notice.

It was while this band was on a tour

Dance music has been one of the two or three primitive elements in the development of musical art. There is bad rag, of course; perhaps most of it is bad; but there is no reason whatever why the fox-trot or other forms of ragtime music should not contribute their share to musical progress, just as in their day the minuet, the gavotte, the jig, and the waltz have done. We wonder how soon an American composer will write a symphony in which the third movement will not be a minuet or a scherzo or a waltz, but some form of rag. The really American musicians of to-day are unfortunately not as a rule the "high-brows," who are composing according to the German model, but the men who in the Broadway shows and in the cabarets are supplying the music that gets to the toes and finger-tips of the average American.

MAKING USE OF CHILDREN

In the Southern States the United States Department of Agriculture and the State colleges are carrying on an exceedingly productive work among boys and girls. Young people between the ages of ten and eighteen are leagued into clubs whose purpose is the development of pure-bred stock and poultry, the cultivation of gardens, and the preservation of foods. These associations of young people have altered the agricultural practices of several States and increased production to a degree which in some localities has amounted to the difference between agricultural insolvency and agricultural prosperity. The enthusiasm of young people for hard work when this brings results which they can grasp is a revelation.

The remarkable statistics of girls' gardening and canning clubs frequently have been set down, but our imaginations have not always probed deeply enough to perceive the truly regenerative influence which the production and marketing of such staples exert on the girls themselves. It is a fact that those women who live in localities where there is remunerative work for them to do remain there and put their strength into the upbuilding of their communities. Girls enrolled in these clubs frequently clear more than three hundred dollars a year, and usually this money is laid up for some educational purpose, often a college education. One little girl in Georgia last year devoted the income from her flock of fifty-three chickens and a garden of one-tenth of an acre to completing payments on a piano, and besides began a college-fund nest-egg. This year she expects to bank three hundred dollars before the end of the season.

Handicrafts are developed as a recreational feature of this club work, and the articles made are sold either among tourists or in the nearest town. Materials are not bought, but requisitioned from woods, fields, or garret. Strong utility baskets are woven from oak splints, decorative ones from sturdy vines which scramble through the woods; even the honeysuckle has been braided successfully into dainty receptacles. The use of pine cones for knobs and handles and of odd little buds and berries shows the feeling which the children have for their materials and craft.

Broom-making from cornstalks is one of the lucrative industries practiced by these clubs. One girl may complete two or three brooms in a day. Rugs are made from oat sacks, which are washed and dyed, torn into strips, and woven together. An agent in Alabama who taught a girl to do this says, "I believe she was the most interested person I have ever seen."

Interest is the keynote and power of all extension work. The reason for this lies in the fact that co-operative demonstration is not something which is forced upon communities from outside, but, on the contrary, is opportunity rising up in the midst of the people, enabling them to develop their own lives by their own efforts.

A SCHOOL THAT TEACHES CITIZENSHIP

A novel experiment in educational methods and civic purpose has for some time been in operation in Lawrence, Massachusetts. It was started as an experiment under the joint auspices of the National Security League and the local school authorities. A recent visit by Mr. H. H. Chamberlin to this Oliver Experimental School, as it is called, has led to a published description by him of some of the unusual and interesting methods. He found, as he says, "a school conducted apparently by the pupils themselves." The children elect several committees, each of which has specific duties in connection with school conduct and even with the teaching. Thus, Mr. Chamberlin found the pupils in a seventh grade room having a lesson in English composition presided over by a little girl who called the pupils up one after another, while all the members of the class were encouraged to criticize or praise or to ask questions about the meaning of words or sentences. One part of the work in English composition was the publishing of a school paper written entirely by the pupils and with a schoolboy editor.

Among the school committees was a Housekeepers' Committee, composed of a number of little girls who made it their business to see that the desks are kept in order, the blackboards cleaned, and that no rubbish or refuse is left in the building. There is an Entertainment Committee, a Transportation Committee (which looks after the coming and going of the children), and a Patriotic League, which helps in new elementary methods of instilling love of country and knowledge of government among the pupils. Discussion by the pupils of subjects of the recitations seems to be a notable feature and one in which the children are exceedingly interested. Strikes had been going on at the time in Lawrence, and interference with school attendance was threatened; but at this school there were only two out of fourteen hundred pupils absent on account of the strike.

The spirit of the children in this school seems to be truly American. "Independence, self-reliance and self-respect were the characteristics of almost every child." Many of them are of foreign descent, and the children voted that they would make it their special business to see that their fathers, brothers, friends, and relatives should become citizens of the United States as soon as possible. This observer asserts that the methods of this school are making a good American out of every child that comes under its influence. Self-discipline is good training for democracy and citizenship, and the most distinctive feature in this school seems to be the placing upon the children themselves of the responsibility, in large measure, for the discipline and conduct of their own education.

INFLUENZA RAVAGES LABRADOR

In a letter recently received by the Grenfell Association of America Dr. Wilfred T. Grenfell, medical missionary to Labrador and Newfoundland, reports the serious devastation wrought by the influenza in that portion of the country. As an example, he states that over twenty per cent of the population of Sandwich Bay, Labrador, perished in the recent epidemic. He points out the pressing need for care of the orphan children who will be left as a result of this catastrophe and for enlarged industrial work. The present orphanage, which is poorly constructed and difficult to run, is full to its capacity, and it will be impossible to meet the problem of caring for so many helpless children unless friends will come to their help and give money for a new brick orphanage to take the place of the present inadequate frame building. Dr. Grenfell states that funds for this purpose have been coming in slowly for some time, but the need has suddenly become so urgent that he feels compelled to make a special appeal to the sympathy of the friends of homeless little children. Donations should be sent to the Grenfell Association, Eugene Delano, Treasurer.

A NEW INCOME TAX

NEW YORK State has enacted a State Income Tax Law. It will probably be regarded as a non-partisan measure because the bill was passed by a Republican Legislature and signed by Governor Smith, who is a Democrat. The law imposes a tax of one per cent on incomes up to ten thousand dollars; two per cent on incomes up to fifty thousand dollars, and three per cent on larger incomes. There are certain exemptions for citizens of the State, following the example of the Federal Income Tax provisions, but not all of these exemptions apply to citizens of other States employed or receiving their incomes in the State of New York. It is estimated that the State will raise about forty million dollars under this new law.

Perhaps in the present acute emergency the law was necessary, but nevertheless we regard it as a bad one, not because of certain minor injustices which will be inevitable in its operation, such as the collection of more tax from a resident of New Jersey or Connecticut who earns his salary in New York City than from a resident of Long Island who may be employed in the same office, but because the law springs from a fundamentally faulty financial system. What has happened is this: The legislators and executive officers of New York State have been appropriating and spending money in a perfectly haphazard fashion. This is especially true of the war period, and the inevitable result has been that the State finds its expenses greatly exceeding its income. Instead of reorganizing its finances, it has set about increasing its cash receipts. A mere superficial examination of the facts shows that the State considered that the easiest and simplest way of getting cash receipts was to tax private incomes.

We do not say that New York State is going to end its present career in bankruptcy, but we do assert that this method of financing is following the direct road to bankruptcy. A private individual who spends right and left without any serious attempt to co-ordinate and regulate his expenditures, and then, [in order to get the necessary cash, mortgages his property or lets it depreciate or draws upon his invested principal is bound sooner or later to come to grief. We do not object to an income tax per se, but we do object to the haphazard financial procedure which has led to the imposition of the present State Income Tax. There are plenty of examples in history of civilized countries being hampered and halted in their national progress by unequal and excessive taxation. Americans are not going to escape this fate simply because they have had in the past enormous natural riches to draw from.

Government expenditure and the imposition of taxes stand in great need of thoroughgoing reform in this country. One of the first steps to any such effective reform is the adoption of a budget system. Under such a system the State of New York would know a year in advance what its expenses will be and what it proposes to spend during the ensuing year, and how it proposes to raise the money. The expenditures of all the departments would thus be co-ordinated with one another. Under such a system the voters of a State would elect, we think, legislators who would oppose waste and extravagance. At present it is utterly impossible for any one to get an intelligent grasp of the expenditures of the State and of the relation of the various departments, bureaus, and commissions to each other on the financial side.

The waste of money and the inefficient expenditure of money in New York State are appalling. This is not wholly the fault of the Legislature or of the Governor. It does no good to try to prevent a flood by stopping a leak here and there. Even the most high-minded and well-meaning Governors get discouraged in their hopeless dealing with the flood of extravagance by vetoing an appropriation here and there. Appropriations should be dealt with together and under one general system. This is the method which for many years has been followed successfully in Great Britain and which has made British political finance the best in the world.

If the citizens of New York State are going to be relieved from the burdens of unnecessary taxation or from taxation out of which they get no reasonable return in benefits performed, they will have to take up the question seriously. Patchwork will not do. The whole financial fabric of the State has got to be reconstructed. The first step is the introduction of the budget system.

AMERICA'S YOUNG VETERANS

DESERVING of widespread attention is the American Legion, the organization of American World War Veterans. The story of the meeting at St. Louis, where the "G. A. R. of the future" was born, was told in The Outlook last week; the story of what the Legion actually will mean to America can be chronicled only in the years to come. But it is timely now to make some estimate of its potentialities and to consider, in passing, its opportunities and obligations, as well as the dangers which, unless well met, inevitably will threaten the full accomplishment of its destiny.

First be it understood what a vastly important force in our National life the Legion almost surely will become—a factor for good or evil, as the case may be. Potentially its membership may embrace four millions, a total roster of all Americans who followed the flag in the Great War. Actually, of course, no such figure will be reached. But if ultimately even half of the ex-soldiers associate themselves with the Legion it will be huge and powerful.

Measure such an organization of to-day by the yardstick of yesterday. The maximum enrollment of the Grand Army of the Republic was about four hundred thousand. Yet the G. A. R. has wielded tremendous influence in those affairs with which it chose to concern itself, whether or not it always wielded it wisely. What, then, may not fairly be expected from an alliance of perhaps two million sturdy young men, individually disciplined and awakened by the experiences of the past two years, in the affairs of a Nation itself awakened?

The G. A. R., perforce, was sectional, like the Confederate Veterans. Also it was partisan, predominantly comprising members of the Republican party. Unlike its predecessor, the Legion of to-day is, happily, non-sectional, the boundaries of its membership being those of the Nation itself; emphatically it is all-American. Also, for the same reason, the Legion is free of partisanship, embracing men of all parties and all shades of political opinion.

Partisanship and selfishness are the twin perils of the American Legion or any similar undertaking. If it allows either to gain a strong foothold within its ranks, it can never make full use of its opportunities. Fortunately, in this regard the Legion has commenced its career irreproachably. For in both word and deed the organization was perfected without a taint of politics, partisan or personal, while the thousand delegates representing the veterans of all the States unanimously refused indorsement of a scheme for grabbing extra pay for discharged soldiers.

"We are here to put something in the Government, not to take something away from it." That phrase of Lieutenant-Colonel Theodore Roosevelt's, who was one of the prime movers in the Legion's formation, echoes its intention. It is, let us hope, likely to become the Legion's slogan. Certainly if the spirit of the St. Louis delegates is any criterion of that of their fellows, the Legion is not likely to become merely a medium of pension-pushing propaganda, and thus slip into the slough of selfishness.

As to politics, the Legion's non-partisanship as exemplified at St. Louis is as refreshing as it is unusual. When the son of a Republican ex-President refused the Legion's leadership from the fear that his acceptance would be interpreted as selfishness, the friends of that Republican with the potent name chose for Chairman a Texas Democrat—an Administration Democrat at that. And Maine and Ohio backed the Texan!

It is refreshing also to note how eager every one was that rank should have no place. Military honors, we are told, are to count for nothing in the affairs of the Legion. Essentially it is to be a civilian organization wherein merit and personality and not military performance will count for preferment. At least so it has started, its methods in this respect heartily indorsed by every advocate of real American democracy.

Absolute Americanism of the one hundred per cent variety is essentially the primal doctrine of the Legion throughout its deliberations thus far. Written clear in the spirit of the men who are making it is the purpose to protect and perpetuate the ideals of democracy for which its members fought or sought to fight. Therein lies its strength and colossal meaning. If, welded together in this new union, America's soldiers shall find a way of expressing their determination that government of the people, for the people, and by the people shall continue and prosper, and voice their will again to fight in behalf of such determination, should need be, the American Legion well may become one of America's mightiest influences for good.

THE SHORT BALLOT

ELSEWHERE in this issue we discuss, under the title "A New Income Tax," the financial situation in New York State, a situation which undoubtedly is duplicated in most of the other States of the Union. The budget system is the first step which is urged in the direction of reform. There is another step which is almost as essential and without which the budget system cannot be made a complete success. This is the adoption of the Short Ballot principle in our State government.

A Short Ballot government is a government in which there are the fewest possible elective officers upon whom are conferred the power and responsibility of appointing all other administrative officials. The name Short Ballot is new, although the principle is not. It is as old as the Constitution of the United States. At the close of the colonial period, when New York State was framing its Constitution, Gouverneur Morris urged upon the delegates to its Constitutional Convention the Short Ballot idea of government. He proposed the election of a Governor who should have very large appointive powers and should be held strictly accountable for the exercise of those powers. But the word governor was an unpleasant one to the people of New York State, to whom it recalled the succession of despotic colonial governors who received their appointment and authority from England. The delegates to the Constitutional Convention refused to accept the advice of Morris and his colleagues and framed a system under which the citizens have ever since felt it the inalienable right of the free American citizen to vote for everybody in the Government from dog-catcher up.

Morris, however, persisted in his idea, and went to the Federal Constitutional Convention at Philadelphia, where his views prevailed. The result is that in the Federal Government we vote for a President, a Senator, and a Congressman. That is practically all. These men can be remembered by name, by character, and by achievement, and they can be held strictly responsible for the exercise of the authority which is delegated to them by the voter. This explains why for more than a century the Federal Government of the United States has been on the whole efficient and free from corruption, while the State and city governments, in which the Short Ballot plan has been ignored, have been generally inefficient and often corrupt.

In recent years there has been a slow but steady growth in public estimation of the Short Ballot idea. It began in municipal government. Some years ago a committee of Americans interested in governmental problems was formed called "The National Short Ballot Organization," to foster the idea of few elective officers upon whom responsibility and accountability should be concentrated. The work of this organization has been largely devoted to city government. Out of this work has grown what is known as the City Manager Plan. It is, in general, the election by the citizens of a small group called a Council, which employs an official called the City Manager. This is following the analogy of the industrial corporation, the most efficient form of carrying on business on a large scale yet devised. The small city Council corresponds to the board of directors, and the City Manager to the president or general manager, of a manufacturing company, who has full direction of the daily activities of the corporation.

Thirteen States have now passed legislation encouraging their cities to adopt the City Manager Plan. Wisconsin is the most recent State to indorse this businesslike method of procedure, and Bristol, Virginia, is the fiftieth American city of eight thousand population or more to accept this modern form of government. Twenty-five additional towns or villages of less than eight thousand population are also trying the City Manager Plan. In all cases the charters are substantially identical, providing for the election of a Council of which the Mayor is merely the chairman without a veto. The appointive power is exercised through the medium of the City Manager, who is engaged by the Council for a definite term. The Manager holds his office subject to the supervision and pleasure of the Council. The Council usually meets once a week in public consultation with the City Manager; the latter appoints and directs the department heads, prepares the annual budget, and is the chief executive secretary and clearing-house of the city government. The City Manager Plan originated, we believe, about ten years ago in Staunton, Virginia. Mr. C. E. Ashburner, who afterwards was promoted to the City Managership of Springfield, Ohio, and then to Norfolk, Virginia, where he is now the Manager, was the first City Manager of Staunton and the first official in this country to bear that title.

The Short Ballot system of government has gone beyond the stage of experiment. It has worked for a hundred years in the Federal Government and it is now proving its success in municipal government. It could be made equally successful in a State government. If a citizen of the State of New York could confine his or her ballot in an election to choosing a Governor, an Assemblyman, and a State Senator, and the Governor could have the power to appoint all other State officers, both judicial and executive, with the advice and consent of the Legislature, we should have a more efficient administration and would not in any degree reduce the democratic rights of the citizen. In fact, those rights would be more sure of being properly protected.

EDITH CAVELL

IN a letter written on the eve of her execution to the nurses for whom she set such a noble example Edith Cavell reminded them that she had always taught them that "devotion to duty would bring you true happiness and that the thought that you had done your duty earnestly and cheerfully before God and your own conscience would be your greatest support in the trying moments of life and in the face of death."

She was not thinking of herself as she wrote, but no words could describe more exactly the guiding principle of her own life. The other day the body of the victim of German inhumanity was brought home to England to rest where her memory will forever invoke reverence for her heroism and womanliness, and will inspire love of country. At Brussels, at Westminster Abbey, and at her native city of Norwich the people in dense throngs silently offered their impressive testimony to "that brave woman who deserves a great deal from the British Empire," as the Bishop of London said. The service at Norwich Cathedral was officially described as "For the funeral of Edith Cavell, a nurse who gave her life for her countrymen."

Like her life and her service, so the tribute to her was simple, unostentatious, sincere. The gun-carriage, the Union Jack, the transfer on a war-vessel, the naval and military ceremonies, were, such as might be fitting for an honored soldier fallen in battle, but the real offering of respect and affection was not in external ceremony but in the heartfelt remembrance her countrymen and all the non-

German world have of her devotion and martyrdom.

Not so is it with spies or traitors! The Germans never did a baser thing than when they coupled the word disloyalty with that of Nurse Cavell, meaning not disloyalty to England or her duty but disloyalty to their view of her obligations to their military laws. Equally characteristic was their attempt to show that giving help to soldiers escaping from Belgium into Holland was giving military aid to Germany's enemy. Nurse Cavell was too honest to lie; her admissions were twisted to make her violation of military rules something quite different from what it really was. Even so, there was absolutely no military law which made death the only punishment for what were alleged to have been her acts. But if law allows a choice between brutality and moderation, when did German militarism ever choose the humane course? She was not a spy; she was not making war; she was saving lives and doing kindly offices to countrymen in distress. Her judges murdered her in haste, having concealed their murderous intention lest the whole world should protest and put a moral barrier of shame against the act. Her last words are said to have been: "Patriotism is not enough. I must have no hatred and no bitterness toward any one."

It is well at this time when German delegates in Paris are complaining that their country is being treated severely to remember, through this memory of the quiet, efficient nurse who loved her country and her countrymen, that her murder was typical of that German spirit of hard inhumanity the world-wide rule of which has been averted only by the sacrifice of life and treasure untold.

THE RED CROSS FOR PEACE

THERE was established in Switzerland in 1864 an organization intended to be international in character, the purpose of which was to alleviate suffering in time of warfare. This organization took as its symbol a Red Cross which was to be used in the field of battle to designate its workers and to protect them as non-combatants. From this symbol has come the name of the Red Cross societies in the various countries. The American Red Cross was a development of this international movement. There was therefore a Red Cross organization in the United States of America when the great European war broke out in 1914.

It was a voluntary and private organization in its administration, but it had a semi-official character because it was approved by the Government; and the President of the United States was often, if not always, the President. It had contributed its services and help internationally in various catastrophes—for example, in the earthquakes of Martinique and Messina and in the great catastrophe at San Francisco.

Now when the European war broke out the American Red Cross was put upon a war basis with a somewhat closer affiliation with the Government than it had ever had before, and a Red Cross War Council was appointed by President Wilson, the President of The American Red Cross. Of this War Council Mr. Henry P. Davison was made the Chairman, and, while doing the work of the Red Cross during the war in various European countries, he has had the military office and title of General. Other Red Cross executives, serving under the War Council and therefore under the direction and authority of Mr. Davison, also received an assimilated military rank.

Since the armistice the American Red Cross has been reorganized on a peace basis again. The War Council finished its work on March first, and Mr. Davison, as its Chairman, retired and became a member of the Executive Committee of the Central Committee, the committee to which the War Council has now returned the responsibility of direction, and which had been the governing body in the Red Cross before the war.

Of this committee Dr. Livingston Farrand, formerly President of the University of Colorado, has been made Chairman. During the war he was director of the tuberculosis work of the International Health Board, and in this work co-operated and came into close contact with the Red Cross.

The work of the Red Cross throughout the world during the war has been so successful and the Red Cross has so clearly proved its usefulness that it is desired and determined actively to perpetuate and extend the international character of the Red Cross in peace time even more vigorously than in war time.

With this object a committee of Red Cross societies, consisting of the representatives of those societies in France, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, and the United States, has requested the International Committee to call a convention which will meet at Geneva within a month of the signing of the Peace Treaty, as already noted in The Outlook. Of the International Red Cross Societies Committee which is formulating the new Red Cross programme for this Convention Mr. Davison is the chairman. It may thus be said that it is hoped in this way to federalize the various national Red Cross organizations, preserving in each one its national character and uniting them in some kind of general co-operative and co-ordinated movement, of which the International Committee, with Mr. Davison as its chairman, may be said to be the administrative head. While there has been an International Red Cross Committee, with its headquarters at Geneva, its work and influence have not been very clearly defined. In other words, the movement inaugurated by Mr. Davison is a movement to centralize the government of Red Cross activities all over the world, preserving to each nation the control and regulation of its own Red Cross Society. In this way the movement may be compared perhaps to that which has given rise to the League of Nations. Thus it may be that at the Geneva Convention what might perhaps be called a world President may be elected. To continue the analogy of federal government, F

Farrand would be the Governor of the American department under this world President. This movement of extension and centralization is to be welcomed both for the sake of efficiency and for the sake of bringing together in international co-operation the men and women who have been doing the wonderful work of the Red Cross, not only in the United States, but in other countries, during the war that has now ended.

Dr. Farrand's work as the practical head of the American Red Cross will be especially devoted to questions of public health in all the ramifications which that leads to, such as hygiene in the school, tuberculosis work, the development of physically defective children, and all those activities of hygiene which contemplate the improvement of physical standards in this country.

THE TRANSATLANTIC AIR FLIGHTS

THERE is something in man's conquest of the air that appeals to the imagination as no other scientific achievement has ever done. The feat of crossing the wide expanse of the Atlantic was as sure to be attempted and in the end by one method or another accomplished as was the laying of the first ocean cable. Difficulty and danger are merely obstacles and drawbacks to be met and overcome by courage and invention. Just as the reaching of the precise point on the map called the North Pole, while not in itself of immense practical value, led for years to the splendid exploits of Arctic exploration, to the development of heroic endeavor, and to the acquisition of substantial knowledge, so the airmen's conquest of the sea, though it may not soon result in the transportation of freight, passengers, or mail, will forward immensely the solving of the problems of air navigation. Only experiment, audacity, and experience have brought about the marvelous airplane development of the past; and just those things must carry it further. Wilbur and Orville Wright in their first feeble flights risked their lives as boldly as did Hawker and Grieve last week. It is the existence of men like them, men of intrepid and adventurous nature, confident in their own power to cope with danger and ill chance, that has made the history of exploration and achievement what it is. The pioneer of the air, like the pioneer in unknown lands, is the precursor of the advance of human endeavor and accomplishment. If Hawker and Grieve have perished, as seems all but certain as we write, even their failure and tragedy will have lessons for the future makers of aviation history.

The several attempts within a single week to solve the cross-ocean flying problem have singularly illustrated the possibilities and weaknesses of the different forms of air navigation. The Sopwith machine guided by Hawker was a single-engined biplane, admirably adapted for a long, fast flight, but with very little provision for saving its occupants if the single engine failed in midocean. Hawker's view was that under reasonable weather conditions he could depend upon his engine as confidently as the man who steps into a business elevator can depend on safety; in both cases there is an element of danger, but in both, he said, it is small. He was eager to prove the superiority of the northern air route as compared with that to the Azores, and firmly believed that with a steady wind and a clear sky the "straightaway" route was the right one. He waited week after week to get the right condition, and even if he were pushed into premature flight by the apparent nearness of success for the NC planes, as seems possible, he certainly did not regard his dash as reckless or suicidal. Hawker and Grieve's exact fate will probably never be known; their names will long be remembered in the annals of aviation as those of bold, determined men and heroes of the air.

The advantage and special danger of the small dirigible (popularly called "blimp") were illustrated by the C-5, the first by its fine, fast voyage to Newfoundland, the second by its failure when anchored near St. John's to withstand the gale which tore it from its moorings and drove it a helpless wreck out to sea, while its officers who tried to save it escaped with their lives but not without injury.

On the other hand, the adventures, mishaps, and successes of the three big NC (Naval-Curtiss) seaplanes showed what careful planning, elaborate precautions, and systematic endeavor may accomplish when combined with endurance and courage. The whole history of the enterprise is one of lasting honor to the United States Navy. The NC-4, the last to reach Newfoundland, was the first to land in the Azores with the world's record for the longest continuous flight made by airplane or seaplane. The slight lead the NC-4 had over her companions saved her from the heavy mist which forced both NC-1 and NC-3 to descend to the water surface, the former to be rescued in an injured condition by a steamer, the latter to "taxi" triumphantly although limpingly, for she was injured, under her own power into the port of Ponta Delgada on the island of San Miguel, where she has been joined by the NC-4, which made its landing on the island of Fayal, and on May 20 flew to Ponta Delgada (150 miles) in less than two hours.

It was confidently expected on May 20 that the NC-4 would be in Portugal within a day or two, for the last "leg" of the undertaking is shorter and easier than that to the Azores. So, without any fatal disaster, with full and skillful guidance by smoke and light signals from destroyers posted along the course, and after coping successfully with the worst danger to seaplanes, the heavy fog which hid their destination, the seaplanes have made their demonstration; each with its four Liberty engines, with its crew of six, with its carrying power of over twenty-five thousand pounds, and with its fair speed capacity, for Lieutenant-Commander Read in the NC-4 is reported to have averaged ninety nautical miles an hour from Trepassey to Horta.

This is assuredly a solid achievement, full of instruction in its conception and execution. And the vicissitudes, adventures, and mishaps may be not the least educative part of the history. The seaplane effort was a National undertaking, not a race nor a trial for a prize nor essentially a competitive attempt. The London "Mail" generously and truly says, "It was a splendid performance, of which any nation might well be proud." Commander John H. Towers, the leader of the seaplane flight, long ago said quietly, "If hard work on the part of all concerned will make this flight a success, it will be a success." His modest confidence has been justified, and so has the supreme value of thorough planning of details in advance.

Apart from the prestige gained by the Navy and the United States from the achievement, it will be of serious, lasting value to designers of aircraft and to the advance of air navigation, which, as most students of this subject believe, is hardly more than in its infancy, despite its already marvelous accomplishment.

SORELY TRIED POLAND

BY VERNON KELLOGG

Mr. Kellogg's service with the Belgian Relief Committee and his admirable articles on subjects relating to war conditions have made him widely known to American readers and thinkers. He speaks on Poland and her needs with full knowledge.—THE EDITORS.

THE Poland that has come to its freedom again has some great difficulties facing it. Out of what seemed like a hopeless predicament as regards its internal politics and the organization of a representative government a most hopeful situation has developed. The Pilsudski-Paderewski coalition Government presents to the world probably as strong a governmental organization as Poland can effect at the moment. It has gained the formal recognition of the Allies, and this means help, in some measure, as regards money, food, and munitions and clothes for the little Polish army fighting on the eastern frontier against Russian Bolshevik murderers and Ruthenian pillagers, and on the western frontier against Germans—who can pillage as effectively as Ruthenians and murder as terribly as Bolsheviks.

But there are other difficulties, to use a too euphemistic term for them, of starvation, of disease, of child suffering, of hospitals bare of medicines and bandages, of poor people half naked, unshod, and out of work.

When our little group of half a dozen men representing the United States Food Administration, sent in by Mr. Hoover as the first food mission to Poland, arrived in Cracow, the ancient capital of the Polish Kingdom, and now the sacred burial place of its long roll of great kings, we were hailed as men come to deliver new Poland from some of its crying miseries. And our welcome was repeated in Warsaw. The Poles saw in us relief from the fear of starvation, and they hoped, from our presence, to find early amelioration of disease and the suffering of children.

The American Food Mission was followed by other missions—military, political, and economic—representing not only America but Great Britain and France, and investigations and conferences are the order of the day. But something more than talking is being done. The American food has begun arriving in ships at Dantsic, whence the food trains are running to Warsaw. The American Red Cross has sent in a working party of fifty men and women, with eleven cars of medical supplies and special food for the hospitals and children's canteens.

But, after all, only the beginning of Polish relief has been made; there is a great work to do in the next few months, and it can be done only with the moral and material support of those people of America and the Allied countries to whom the relief of Poland will appeal as yet another opportunity to give all their encouragement and aid to a sorely beset people struggling against great difficulties to recover from the terrible misfortunes of war. While during all the four years of the war Belgium and invaded France could be reached with food and clothing and moral encouragement, Poland was shut away from this aid. Only now is she open to the tangible expression of the sympathy of the world. Poland is free—and free to the administrations of any who would be her Good Samaritan.

All through the war Poland was a battlefield. She was ravaged and ravaged by moving armies during the course of the back-and-forth fighting. Finally she was no less, and much more systematically, ravaged by her occupying conquerors. Her food stores were requisitioned, her harvests reaped, by alien hands. Her factories, like those of Belgium and North France, were stripped of raw materials, belting, and machines. Her great industrial city of Lodz, the "Manchester of Poland," with its many cotton and woolen mills, is a city of half a million souls dead in life. Not a wheel turns; a hundred thousand idle workmen throng the streets or sit dumbly at home, living on the meager rations that a stripped land has tried to provide them, and watching their wives and children grow weaker and weaker as the months go by.

In pillaging Lodz the Germans revealed their usual thoroughness, naïveté, and brutality. If the copper could be easily cut out of the machines, it was done without utterly destroying the other parts; but if not, the machines were simply battered to pieces for the sake of the bits of copper.

In one of the great woolen mills that I visited in Lodz there were so many machines with so many copper-covered rolls to strip that the Germans, not having among their soldiers enough skilled men to remove the copper from them with little work, simply took out the whole rolls, shipped them to Germany, where the copper was stripped from them (making them useless until re-covered), and then shipped them back—with a bill for the transportation both ways, which the mill-owners had to pay or go to jail.

The armistice came too late to save to the Poles their 1918 harvest. The Germans took sixty per cent of it away with them. That is the special reason why Poland must have 50,000 tons of food-stuffs a month for the next six months, or from February 1 until the next harvest, to keep her people alive. Their animals were slaughtered for them, including many of their milch cows. When we arrived in Poland (in January), the children of Lemberg had had no milk since November. As you may imagine, not all of the Lemberg children who were alive in November are alive now. And the others have stopped growing. In the mining region of Dombrowna and certain other parts of southern Poland the situation is quite as desperate. We were so impressed by the horror of this child-Golconda that, knowing that the food from America, or even from our American stocks in Rotterdam, would necessarily take some time to arrive, we arranged, despite lack of available funds or knowledge of where they would come from, to buy—on our own promise to pay, some time, some way!—five car-loads of condensed milk and four car-loads of mixed foodstuffs in Switzerland, and have them sent by a special train to Lemberg and the other worst places. What a welcome that train got! And there are children alive to-day who would not be alive but for that special train.

Lemberg is in its especially terrible condition because it has been besieged by the Ruthenian bands, officered by Germans and Austrians, for two months. Shells were falling in the city when the food train arrived. Lieutenant Chauncey McCormick, of the Food Mission, who went to Lemberg from Cracow with the train, saw a little boy killed in the street near him by a bursting shell. The water mains have been broken and the electric lighting extinguished. The people form in queues at the few wells in the city, awaiting their turn to get a pitcher of dangerous water. For they get typhoid as well as water from these wells. Cleanliness is impossible, and typhus rages. The wounded among the soldiers and university students and women who composed the defending forces of the city crowd the hospitals, where their wounds are bandaged with paper and straw, and their needs of medicines and special food cannot be met.

It was partly in response to this story of Lemberg that the American Red Cross so swiftly prepared and sent on their large party and their special train of medical and hospital stores.

But it is not only the hospitals of Lemberg that need help. All over Poland, in all the civil and military hospitals, the same complete lack of supplies exists. And in the druggists' shops there is a lack of many of the most essential drugs. Mme. Paderewski, wife of the great Polish patriot, who has proved himself by his statecraft and his inspiration of the whole Polish people so much greater as a man than as one of the greatest modern artists of music, closes a pitiful letter to the Food Mission recounting the bitter need of medicines and surgical dressings with this sentence: "Kindly excuse my troubling you, and help us, in God's name."

All over Poland to-day are disease and rapid death. The ravages of certain diseases have increased enormously during the last three years. The deaths in Warsaw from tuberculosis were 2,776 in 1915, 4,302 in 1916, and 8,102 in 1917. The typhus cases increased from 1,809 in 1915 to 15,871 in 1917, and 10,645 in the first half of 1918. The cases of dysentery in Warsaw were six times as many in 1917 as in 1916. It is the now only too-familiar story. Where there is lack of food the people die, not, or only rarely, of direct starvation, but because of lack of resistance to the usual diseases. When they fall ill, they do not get well.

Poland has great resources—but they can be made available only by a strong, sound people. Poland has a great future—but to assure it she has immediate needs that must be met by her friends outside. The food has started going in; the medicines and hospital supplies have begun to do their beneficent work. But new Poland is a land of twenty-five million people. Her needs are very great; her helping friends must be very many.

IN THE GRIP OF THE BOLSHEVISTS

BY ALESSANDRO H. CARASSO, PH.D.

Dr. Carasso has recently come out of Russia. He was imprisoned by the Bolsheviki, and released only after the payment of a large ransom. He is a graduate of the University of Geneva, and is an American citizen. His wife (to whose disappearance in the Russian maelstrom with his little boy he poignantly refers in the course of his story) is the daughter of a Russian general.—THE EDITORS.

THE year 1910, during which I arrived in Russia, was one of the most reactionary in its history. The Russian Bismarck—Premier Stolypin—crushed every liberal thought and movement with his iron hand. It was he who brought the 1905 uprising to such a tragic end. His notorious "necklace"—as one of the sarcastic Duma delegates described his gallows rope—strangled every red throat in the country. He was reactionary to the depths of his soul—a brutal but an honest man. Who knows but perhaps his keen vision foresaw all that is now happening in Russia—the land he knew and loved so well? Yes, reaction was then at its zenith. But nevertheless it was the proletariat revolt of 1905 that tore the veil from many an obscure corner and exposed Russia in a new and entrancing light which aroused the curiosity of the world.

RUSSIA UNTIL THE REVOLUTION

Russia was always a fairyland. Many good souls in far-away countries have fancied that in Petrograd and Moscow wolves and bears are leisurely prowling through the streets at midday. But if this idea has been exaggerated in regard to the metropolises, the legend contains a kernel of truth in the case of provincial villages, where the above-mentioned visitors are not so rare. At the same time Russia possessed the most excellent theaters, as Stanislawsky's Art Theater in Moscow, and the Maryinsky Opera House in Petrograd, with a ballet the most perfect the world over. There are the great picture galleries, the Hermitage in Petrograd and the Tretiakoff in Moscow. Indeed, at the same time that the bears and wolves roamed freely through the streets of the villages, in the capitals every cobbler and doorman was in reach of a telephone—and I must admit, in passing, that Russian telephones are superior to ours. Yes, Russia is a land of contrasts. In the village or hamlet where most homes were roofless one could locate a villa or palace unrivaled in splendor anywhere on the Continent. Oh, so beautiful was this country! The golden domes of her innumerable Byzantine churches fairly gleamed throughout the land. And when on a holiday morning thousands of gigantic bells pealed their chimes through the skies it was almost incredible to fancy such divine harmony wrought on this sinful sphere. Then there is the diversity of the land! You can ride for days and weeks and see only plain steppes without tree or shrub—mere dreary stretches, such as the steppes of Ufa and Orenburg. Then behold the Caucasus; hundreds and hundreds of miles of mountains, wonderfully striking mountains, like the Kasbeck and the Elbrus—perhaps the most imposing in the world. Then the endless expanse of waters—lakes, river, and sea! What can be more charming than the primitive banks of the Volga, especially the steep cliffs behind Nijni, whence the famous river pirate Attaman-Stienka Razine threw the Persian princess into the water! This river runs for thousands of miles through Russia—from the German border to the Urals and Caucasus. The seas—Black, Caspian, and Baltic—open up all parts of Asia and Europe. Then consider Crimea and the Ukraine—an area equivalent to several European countries—entirely covered with gardens of all fruits of the world. Then view Siberia—you can wander there for days and weeks, weeks and months, and see nothing but woods, woods, and woods. The famous Taiga!

All these scenes I have visited myself during my sojourn of years in Russia, oftentimes alone, oftentimes in the company of American tourists.

Now her hospitality. Where in the world could foreigners receive so cordial and sincere a reception as in Russia? One arrives here without tongue, without friends, without a solitary acquaintance, and within a fortnight one has been already welcomed into the best Russian homes. Naturally, one must possess a certain amount of education and refinement. Education, in particular, was there considered on a high plane. The person with education, with some linguistic ability, and, in addition, of foreign birth—such a person was highly appreciated and beloved in Russia. With the kindly assistance of his friends, he had open access to the highest social and official life. And the manner in which such education was there rewarded can scarcely be conceived in America. And of course such personages as ambassadors and consuls were reckoned among the first men of the land.

Still more remarkable in hospitality to foreigners was the village. You entered a peasant's hut and asked for a glass of water. You soon were invited to the table, where, after a few moments, a jug of milk and a loaf of bread appeared. Forgetting his daily task, the peasant started to question you about your country, family, and business; and if it grew dark, or began to rain, you might be sure to find shelter here. But don't offer him any remuneration—this would only insult him.

RUSSIA, THE HOME OF MODERN MUSIC, LETTERS, AND ART

Since the early eighties Russia has occupied one of the foremost ranks in the world of art. Glinka, Tchaikowsky, Rubinstein, fathers of Russian classical music, not only founded but erected the structure of a new epoch. They were the first to transcend the melodramatic romanticism of the Italian and French composers and wave their magic wand all over the world.

Europe and America suddenly saw upon the stage new, unpuppet-like characters who told of their human experiences and feelings in their humanly musical language. From king to peasant, each lived and sang his own song—the first of his palaces, the last of his thatched cottages. The old-fashioned shepherds who were wont to sing truly beautiful but angelically high melodies were left in the background. In a word, the great Russians created a vast human realism which has reigned to the present day, and will, I think, reign as long as human souls are human. The operas "Life for the Czar," by Glinka, "The Queen of Spades" and "Eugenie Onyegin," by Tchaikowsky, and "The Demon," by Rubinstein, have no peer in the musical world. Even their spiritual children and grandchildren—as Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, Scriabin, and scores of others—stand asunder from the horde.

The power of the Russian artist lies in his extraordinarily broad culture. No country has such educated artists as Russia. Commencing with the giants—Pushkin, Tolstoy, Dostoyevsky, Turgenev, and concluding with the self-educated Gorky, Andreieff, Kuprine, and Archibasheff—all were products, not of university, but of universal learning. Some of them knew and controlled from four to eight languages; as, for instance, Tolstoy and Turgenev, who could hardly tell which of the European tongues they knew best (and in the word "know" I mean all it implies, i. e., speaking, writing, reading the entire literature, and understanding the psychology of their nations). For this reason we may read without wonder "War and Peace," by Tolstoy, in which all intricacies of military strategy, natural history, geography, biology, romanticism, music, and history are treated as by authorities specializing in each field. Where in the world can one find such deep psychological research as in Dostoyevsky's romances? His "Brothers Karamasoff" and "Crime and Punishment" do not have, and, it appears to me, never will have, any match. Russia has also world-renowned scholars, such as Podvitzotsky, Metchnikoff, and Mendeleeff. Indeed, this is a land of contrasts. Hand in hand with eighty per cent of illiterate population we find this herculean learning restricted to a few.

The same is the case with Russian painters. Commencing with Bruloff, famous for his immortal painting "The Last Days of Pompeii," and concluding with the contemporary Riepin, whose "Ivan the Terrible" is internationally famous, all are incomparable in their learning, psychological analysis, and technique. I do not mention here such original geniuses as Vassietzoff, Sieroff, and Wrubel.

THE RUSSIA OF TO-DAY

Unfortunately, this is in the past. This is Russia of bygone days—before the war and Revolution. The Russia of to-day is entirely different—another Russia, without musicians, without writers, without painters. No, the last may be said to exist still, but they are of another species; I call them "Red Painters," for they recognize no other color than that of crimson blood. These are the Bolsheviks. Of this great country of endless riches, country of artists and thinkers, the Bolsheviks have made a woebegone madhouse. Madmen have risen over the land, overwhelmed all those opposing them and imprisoned them in dungeons. As to all demented, the color of red appeals to them and they redden the world around them.

Tragedy of tragedies! Tragedy of madmen! Its stage managers have hidden it from the gaze of an outer audience. And most tragic of all, this scene of millions of souls weltering in blood is merely a rehearsal boding an even greater, grimmer spectacle to follow. Indeed, the bloodiest of pageants will surely follow unless a courageous public opinion rises to the cry of the moment and calls a halt to the tragic farce. And farce it is—like that of Edgar Allan Poe's in which is depicted an uprising among the inmates of a lunatic asylum who bind their keepers and run the asylum to suit themselves.

Such a madhouse is Russia to-day. Under the open heavens these madmen wreak their lust. With the blood of millions they stain their hands and everything about them—cities, streets, homes, schools. The death cry of their victims sounds sweet to their ears, for they spare none. They kill relentlessly, incessantly—no matter who their victims are, Russians or foreigners.

THE PERSECUTION OF FOREIGNERS

The wholesale arrests of foreigners are due apparently to the aversion on the part of the Bolsheviks to permit the outside world to witness their maniac doings. Any foreigner is liable to suspicion and immediate arrest. Those capable of raising large funds may sometimes bribe their way to freedom. There are many to-day lingering in dungeons where their only sustenance is a bit of hope and a pitcher of water and a quarter of a pound of bread every other day. Then sometimes they mysteriously disappear.

American citizens have also tasted bread in Russian jails. As soon as the news spread of our soldiers landing on the Murman coast a series of wholesale arrests of Americans began.

The Extraordinary Commission, a sort of mediæval inquisition, gathered in all discoverable Americans and Frenchmen. Some have been able to buy their way to freedom at a price of from ten thousand to one hundred thousand rubles. Many others who, unfortunately, cannot afford to pay such big sums are still festering in underground cells, awaiting their release here or in the world eternal. Any moment our American brethren may be sent to Cronstadt to be shot, victims of Bolshevik wild mania.

Hear them! Hear them cry: America, help!

Nor did I escape the unfortunate fate of these foreigners caught in their grasp. On September 30 I was compelled to visit on business the "Northern Commune," as the old city of Peter the Great is now called. During the day I had a feeling that something evil would befall me, for at every step I made in the city I perceived two suspicious characters spying on me from a distance. For this reason I hid all my money and jewelry that evening with special precaution, for I was ready for anything.

Indeed, about two o'clock that night a powerful knock thundered at my door. "Who is there?" I asked. "The Extraordinary Commission." I was forced to open. Half an hour later I was at the late Municipal Headquarters, now occupied by the Extraordinary Commission.

Upon my query for the reason of my arrest I was given the cold reply, "As American officer and spy." They were well aware that I was neither. But what could I do?

Six and a half weeks I spent in an underground dungeon, subsisting on two ounces of bread and a can of water a day. The sword constantly hung over my head. Each day saw some of my fellow-prisoners spirited away—and they were never seen again.

Nevertheless, through the never-failing medium of a considerable amount of money I managed to buy my freedom. The end of November found me in Stockholm. Fancy my elation when I found myself at last able to breathe freely without the fear of death! Also I could eat as much as I wished. Yet my joy was sadly incomplete, for far, far in that cold land of Russia, surrounded by the Red maniacs, were left my wife and my adorable four-year-old boy George. Only God Almighty knows what has occurred to them in the few months since last I saw them. Are they even alive?

Oh, if I could only bring Bolshevism home to you as it has been brought home to me! It is so hard for those in civilized countries to picture it even in a general way! Could you imagine New York in ruins, its great White Way littered with dead horses; all restaurants, gilded lobster palaces, theaters, closed? This description may seem exaggerated to some of you. But I have seen this state of affairs in Petrograd—the New York of Russia—and let me tell you that it was all very, very tragic.

Four years ago Petrograd was one of the most lively cities in Europe. Its streets were bustling with activity. Its homes, shops, theaters, and restaurants were brilliant with life, gayety, and excitement. Its people were happy in the day's work and play.

To-day? This great metropolis is barren as a desert. There is no trace of its former glory. Its restaurants and theaters are the grimy barracks of a lunatic army. Instead of the sweet strains of music are heard the roar of cannon and the staccato barks of machine guns. People are impoverished and hungry. Children die before their birth or afterward on their mothers' fallen bosoms. Not only do people drop from exhaustion, but even the machines, factories, and traffic halt for lack of energy. People are too busy cutting throats to cut wood for fires.

Nevsky Prospect, once the Broadway of Petrograd, whose fair pedestrians compared with the fairest on the Avenue de l'Opéra or Piccadilly, whose granite pavements were models of cleanliness, is no more. Now these walks are littered with rubbish, and the commonest frequenters are dead horses, whose pestilential odors are rife with diseases; horses which disappear at night in a mysterious manner—that is, mysterious to him who has not felt hunger.

I have seen the famished figures creep forth at night, knife in hand, to prey on this God-sent carrion. Providence is kind and illumination is absent. No one will interfere. He who is first upon the scene claims the choicest morsel, and what cares he if its nourishment is infectious? or if he even must cross daggers for his fatal morsel?

I have seen mothers and daughters creeping forth sometimes in twilight to appease their hunger on raw horseflesh. My wife saw one such sight that prostrated her. When I finally revived her, the horse and its famished guests had entirely disappeared. It all happened in a few minutes.

CATEGORIES

Not all classes have to fight over carrion; there are some people who are going on comparatively well. These are the fortunates—those of the "first category." The population in Russia is divided by the Bolsheviks into four categories.

The first category is made up of those who are doing hard work for the Government. Soldiers are included in this class and workers in Government factories. The Bolshevik Government tries to take good care of its army, and in great measure succeeds. Members of the first category are allowed half a pound of bread a day, and they can buy this in soviet shops at 1 ruble 33 copecks a pound.

The second category consists of clerical workers, servants, and the like, whether in the employ of the Government or of private persons. Each member of this class is allowed a quarter of a pound of bread a day, at the same price.

The third class is made up of such people as the widows of officers and members of the nobility who are living on pensions or private incomes. The widow of a general, for example, gets a pension of one hundred rubles a month, but that represents only about five dollars' actual purchasing power in Russia now. These people are allowed, sometimes as often as once a week, but rarely with such frequency, either one-eighth or one-sixteenth of a pound of bread, a pound or half a pound of potatoes, and two herrings.

The fourth category consists of the proprietors of little stores, shops, and factories. Their weekly food allowance is two herrings—no bread at all. Their tools have been taken away from them, they have no materials to work with, but, if they have employed people, they must go on paying their wages. The last two classes have no rights whatever; in Moscow they cannot even ride in the street cars.

All the food that people get in addition to their allowance must be purchased at exorbitant prices.

Here are some quotations current in Petrograd:

	Rubles. <sup>1</sup>
Bread, black, corn, per pound . . .	13-24
Potatoes, unwashed, per pound . . .	4-6
Butter or fat, per pound . . .	50-80
Apples, each . . . . .	3-7
Horse meat, per pound . . . .	12-20

If you imagine that these articles of food can be bought in the open market, you are mistaken; only in silent by-streets under the hidden cloak can they be bought, and woe be to the buyer if caught in the act by the Red Guard! If said authority merely confiscates the food, the buyer can be happy, for he might have been led off to a place of repentance for a long period of meditation.

A familiar scene is as follows: You are passing the market-place, when a moderately intelligent looking being approaches you and confidently hints of a small loaf hid under his cloak. Hungrily you halt him and clinch the bargain. A sad-looking civilian comes up from behind, a shrill whistle, and suddenly about you rise, as from the ground, a score of Red Guards, ready to shoot you at the least motion. In a second you are standing before the soviet commissar.

HAPPINESS

BY MARY WASHBURN BALDWIN

Oh, happiness is very good !
Better than air, better than food,
Better than wings that bear on high
The airships in the sunny sky !

Stronger than tonic of the sea
It sings its bracing melody.
Like violets scattered on the sod,
It brings the very breath of God.

SISTER OHIO

A MEMORY OF THE CIVIL WAR

BY LUCY SEAMAN BAINBRIDGE

MASSACHUSETTS school days were over, and in the spring of 1864 I was in Washington. Mr. Lincoln had welcomed an Ohio regiment, saying, "I know you will do your best," and there were many men at the front and in camp from this State.

With my mother I was at dinner with friends, the Ohio Military Agent, head of the Ohio Soldiers' Aid Society, being the principal guest. He told us of the terrible sufferings at Fredericksburg. "The conditions are worse," said he, "than in the winter of 1862, when so many thousand dead and wounded lay along the banks of the Rappahannock and the Army of the Potomac was so sorely depressed. Without going into the causes or blunders which have brought this, the fact is that along the river and in the city streets and on the floors of the houses our men are sick, wounded and suffering, helpless and dying. It is an awful condition there!"

Strange talk for a dinner table, but it was a time of war. "I am here," continued the Military Agent, "to send down a relief party to do what it can for these poor brave boys of ours. Several young men of our State have obtained furloughs from their business; the Rev. Mr. Prugh, of Ohio, a clergyman of good standing, will be the head of the party. I have one efficient woman, a widow from Cincinnati, who will arrive to-morrow, and is ready to go—but—I can't send one woman alone." Turning to my mother, he asked: "Will you go? You have had large experience; you could give most valuable help. Can't you go down with the party? Take your daughter along with you—she can help." A telegram telling of sickness at home made her answer: "Impossible; but you may send my daughter, and I will go as far as Acquia Creek with her to see whether or not she can be of any use."

It must be remembered that in our country at that time there were no trained nurses; but from the school of home experience, endowed with practical common sense, ready to serve as best they could, a few women were of great use in hospitals and in some instances at the front.

It was no gala party on that transport which took us down from Washington to meet the train from Fredericksburg. There was nothing before us but work for suffering, dying men. It was understood from the first that hardly the ordinary courtesies of social life were to be observed. If women were to go into that kind of service, they were to be ready to do fully their part, and in no sense to become a burden to the men who were so greatly needed. This was understood.

Oh, what a procession that was from train to transport—men hobbling, limping, staggering—each man able to help lending a hand to those utterly helpless. There were few stretchers; blankets, and even sheets, were improvised for carrying the men who could not walk. Wounded, sick, and faint, they reeled from the railway to the friendly boat, where they gladly lay down on the hard boards. A narrow pathway was left between the feet of the two rows of men packed closely together on the floor of the transport. The few doctors were indeed busy and very quickly used my mother's practical knowledge of medicine and nursing.

In the midst of groans, creaking of machinery, and swash of the river, and no one to direct her, what could a girl do? Only this: A pail was found and filled with water; then lips were moistened, dried rags soaked with blood around the wounds were wet, and bits of old flannel shirts, made to serve as temporary bandages, were eased up by the water. Water! Water! Water! How the men on that hard floor, packed close together, craved the comfort of it on face and hands and wounds!

"Good," said the doctor, as he hurried by. "Now make some punch—can you? We must keep these fellows alive till we get them to Washington." All through that night, long for the poor men but short to us who worked, we fought pain and death. Kneeling on the floor beside the men, one and another looked up as the comforting water or the spoonful of punch touched his lips, and said, "Oh, bless ye! God bless ye!"

On reaching Washington our boat was quickly emptied. The men were lifted into ambulances and sent to the hospitals, but many were laid away in the quiet rest at Arlington. We made ready promptly to return for another boat-load.

Said the Military Agent, most cordially: "I shall be very pleased if you will spare your daughter to go down to the base of supplies with our party. All of them ask this, and the clergyman, the leader, will take her under his wing." And so I went to the front.

There was no pretty nurse's cap or white uniform, to wear, just plain, everyday clothes—a gingham dress and apron; no dainty and becoming white veil with a red cross over my forehead or on my arm, but simply on my left breast was pinned a badge of red silk, on which were printed the words in gilt, "Ohio Relief." Thus I went down the Potomac under the special guardianship of the leader, whom I called Father Prugh. At Port Royal on the Rappahannock, White House Landing on the Pamunkey, and, last, at City Point I had experiences of war which memory will never lose. How much was accomplished is for the arithmetic of eternity.

The State of Ohio gave us stores of condensed milk, dried toasted bread, crackers, sugar, canned fruits, jellies, and so forth, and our practical State sent to each of us women a good umbrella, which we used for sun and rain. Away down within the boom—boom—boom of the cannonading, close to the front, what could our party of untrained though willing people do? Surely what could a girl really accomplish? Woman's work is made up of little things, and these little things put together make the whole. So with that thought I worked.

Because of lack of army supplies or because they were tied up with red tape, more poor fellows were brought wounded and helpless back from the front than there were tents to cover them. On the grassy floor they were laid close together, with an orderly to care for them as best he could. When the tents were filled to the utmost, other men from the battle and rifle pits were left outside on the grass.

One very hot day a soldier lay with upturned face exposed to the pitiless heat of the Virginia sun. The bandages around his arm and leg were stiff and hard with blood. Was he black or white? Dirt, powder, and sunburn made it difficult to determine. Was he dead or asleep? He did not move. He did not seem to inexperienced eyes even to breathe, but water on the rags about the wounds, water on his lips, water on his face and head, had the desired effect, and the eyes slowly opened. With such material as I could find in the vicinity, a little improvised tent was put up over his head and face and neck. One of the doctors, coming hurriedly by and seeing my attempt to protect the man from the hot sun, called out, "Bully for you, Miss Ohio. I'm awfully busy, but I'll try to come back and give you a little help with that fellow. Feed him some punch."

Among the wounded men lying in one of the tents another day—men recently brought from the very front and waiting to get to Washington—was a soldier who called out, "Say, please, Ohio Relief, what's your name?" Pointing to my badge, I replied, "There's my name." "Well, Sister Ohio, I am from that State too, and the worst of it is I am hungry, and that orderly has too much to do to bother with me. What are you going to do for a fellow who wants to eat and can't feed himself?" Both arms were shot and he was helpless. I soon found that he was ready for bread and milk, and liked it better than anything else, he said. So my supplies of crackers, toasted bread, and condensed milk were put to good use.

I fed him for several days until he was carried to a Washington hospital.

Many months afterward this same soldier in the uniform of a major, with his left sleeve empty, called at my home in Ohio, and said: "You see, I found out your name and who you were, and I have come to thank you and to have some bread and milk with you. But you won't have to feed me."

Later this soldier honored me with the suggestion that I take bread and milk with him all his life!

Outside a tent, under the ropes which held it in place, lay a soldier boy, groaning and doubled up with pain. Said the orderly, in a kindly voice, "I'm just sorry for him, Miss Ohio, but he can't be 'lowed in the tent; it's chuck full of wounded men, anyhow. He's got the cramps and he don't stay in one spot very long. He was over the other side until a few minutes ago. I'm too awful busy to tend to him." In my supplies were medicines for dysentery, and so I went to work. Careful feeding, regular medicine, a warm blanket on the grass, with the added oil of kindness, and the lone boy was in fair condition in time for the next boat-load to Washington.

When other duties to the suffering bodies allowed for a respite, Father Prugh held a short, informal service of song and cheer, in each tent. Here a girl could really help.

Frankey was a Michigan boy. Our duty was first to the men of Ohio, and after that to any one else. The lad had been terribly hurt, shot through both arms and one leg, and the wounds were full of gangrene and vermin. Frankey had lied about his age and had run away from home to enlist; he was only a boy. Said the doctor: "Miss Ohio, that little fellow thinks he is to have a furlough and that he is to go home to his mother. He is soon to die. Don't make him feel bad—but—oh, well, well, do as you like." The boy responded to every kindness and wanted Sister Ohio to take care of his precious possessions—green and yellow skeins of sewing-silk taken at Fairfax Court-House, and a ring he had cut out of a nut when his leg had been hurt but when he could use his arm. He talked of his furlough and his mother and the Sunday school, and how glad he was that he had been in the fight. At last his mind was turned to the thought that perhaps he might not be able to get home to his mother; he grasped the idea that his furlough was to be very long, and that in the Father's house he would meet mother and tell her how sorry he was that he had lied. At the service that Sunday afternoon he asked that we sing his favorite hymn. It sounds old-fashioned now, but he loved it—"There is a happy land, far, far away." He tried to join in the singing; and then that hymn, "I have a Saviour in the promised land," he wanted sung twice. Before the next boat-load was shipped to Washington, Frankey entered into the land where there is no war. He said good-by that Sunday afternoon and gave me as a remembrance a tiny skein of the silk; the balance I was to send to his mother. "Please, Sister Ohio, you tell her I am all right inside, and you know you are my sister, and maybe I won't be here to-morrow, and will you kiss me good-by 'cause my mother ain't here?"

At the end of the row of men lying on the ground in one of the tents, one day, was a man so wounded that he had severe hemorrhages. An orderly said, "Don't give him any time, Miss Ohio; he is a goner, he will never get to a hospital." The poor fellow knew it himself all too well, but said, as I sat by him, "Will you write to my wife and tell her to make my children know that I gave my life for my country? I want my boy to know about his father. Tell them I thought of them." The story in full was written. I added a tiny lock of hair and a special message from the father to the boy who bore his name, and as I read it to the suffering man, his gratitude was expressed in a whispered "God bless you." As night came on I gave him a verse of comfort and strength from God's Word, and he said, longingly, as I left him, "Sister Ohio, please come here first in the morning, and if—" At the first break of the dawn I was there; his place on the grass was empty; a sudden severe hemorrhage, and the spirit was released. The body had been taken away, for there was no time for delay. I hurried to the cemetery. There were so many who had died in the night, and there was so much to do for those who were suffering, that there was no time for services, but as that body was laid underground, Sister Ohio was kindly allowed by the man in charge to have the spade of earth held for a moment while a verse and a short prayer were repeated.

When the Army base was moved to City Point, there was delay in the arrival of the stores and goods. There were tents, but beds and blankets would come later. Our food was of the simplest sort for a day or two. Johnny, a drummer boy, detailed temporarily to the Christian Commission tent near by, all unseen, rolled in a can of peaches under the edge of the canvas of our tent, and later came peeping in to say, "Well, Sister Ohio, I'm from good old Bosting, but just you count on me if you need anything." When he went back to the front, he asked for a little piece off the side of my blue check apron as a memento of our friendly acquaintance. Many years, yes, very many years afterward, a bald, gray, bent man, worn and disabled, called to see me, and asked if I was Sister Ohio, and did I remember Johnny, the drummer boy at City Point.

It was true that at City Point we only had a tent, but we each had a big shawl, and there was a log for a pillow and a grassy floor to lie on. That first night there an officer at dusk came to us and said: "There is a lady alone whom we want to accommodate. She has business with headquarters. All we can do is to ask you ladies to take her in as your guest to-night." We gladly gave her a share of our log pillow, and I divided my warm shawl with her as a covering. It was dusk when she came, it was early dawn when she left, so our guest, Clara Barton, who later organized the American Red Cross and was its first President, did not know who had been her hostess. Years afterward the Rev. Amory Bradford, of Montclair, held a series of meetings in his church, giving one day to addresses on the work of women. There were three speakers—a lady from Boston, Clara Barton, and myself. With the permission of Dr. Bradford, I was allowed to introduce the speaker who followed me. I had never seen Clara Barton since that night we had spent together under my blanket-shawl at City Point. I told the story of the stranger who came to us that night in the tent, and then presented Miss Barton to the audience. With her cloak thrown back, showing its gay lining, the medals on her breast flashing, and her face full of light and life, she extended her hand and clasped mine, saying, "I have often wondered who the girl was who gave me a part of her pillow and warm shawl, and I have always wanted to thank her for her hospitality, and to meet her again—and now I say, God bless you." The hearty cheers of that big audience one can never forget.

My evenings at the front were all needed for writing letters—letters to wives, mothers, and sweethearts. One very warm night the entrance curtain of my tent was pushed back and I sat at my desk, which was the top of a packing-box, and by the light of a candle was writing when a man, not a soldier, came in to have a social chat with my tent-mate, the widow. I was introduced; that was all. I had many letters to get off, and was not there for any social calls. Late that night, when my widow friend was out on some errand, a tap on my tent pole roused me. "Who is there?" I asked. "What is wanted?" A man's voice replied, giving his name, and making it evident that he had utterly mistaken my character and my mission. My sharp reply was followed by my taking up a hatchet with which I had opened a box and clanging it down upon a pile of nails which lay there, and saying, with a tone and emphasis which he could understand, "The first man who crosses this threshold will be a dead man." The vile creature did not walk away; he ran with all his might.

BADGE WORN BY SISTER OHIO
A cherished souvenir of the Civil War

For the first time in all her experiences at the front Sister Ohio called upon the kind services of Father Prugh and the staff of royal young men with him. That midnight caller left for Washington the next day.

Furlough time was up for some of the party, the widow had special business to attend to in Cincinnati, and so I went to my home in Cleveland, Ohio.

During the many years which have come and gone since then a few letters have been received which tell me that my memory is not a dream. One to myself and one to my son are added here:

Fort Leavenworth, Kansas,
January 9, 1881.

Dear Madame: You are no doubt surprised at a letter from an old friend. I hope you have not forgotten your little Soldier Friend, who knew you down with the Army of the Potomac. I was of the Twentieth Massachusetts Volunteers. After that I went into the Navy and was shipwrecked. . . .

Good-by and God bless you is the prayer of your old friend,
JOHNNIE DOYLE.

Treasurer's Office, Trumbull County,
Warren, Ohio, September 10, 1903.

. . . November 5, 1861, I enlisted in the 6th O. V. Cav. Re-enlisted January, 1864, and on May 28, 1864, was severely wounded at Erron Church or Hawes Shop, Virginia. The Army moved, and the sick and wounded were sent to White House Landing on the Pamunkey River. Tents at the Landing were put up for us soldiers, and well I remember your mother (then a young lady) with an older lady from Cincinnati, Ohio, going around among the soldiers looking for Ohio boys, as they were sent by the Ohio Relief to care first for Ohio soldiers. How well I remember boys from other States wishing they were from Ohio!

One day one of the boys from my regiment was walking around with his arm in a sling (he was wounded in the arm) and suddenly his arm began to bleed very bad. The boys called, and one of our soldier nurses came and took him to the doctors who were amputating limbs. But soon the poor fellow came back, and such a look as he had when he said the doctors said he had to die, as mortification had set in and an amputation would do no good. I shall never forget that poor fellow's look. But he rapidly grew worse and lay down upon the ground (we had no cots then), suffering very much. A doctor came in, and the soldiers asked if he could not do something for him. The doctor replied, "My poor fellow, I can't do a thing for you." He soon died, and was carried out for burial just as your mother came in. How she did hurry out to see if she was too late to get a lock of his hair to send to his wife and family with a letter! I wonder if she remembers it.

The Army again had to move and change its base of supplies. The sick and wounded were put on transports. Another comrade and myself were put on the transport Connecticut, and your mother saw that our cots were placed side by side, and she gave us a bottle of wine to keep our strength up during our trip to Washington. . . .

Very truly yours,
J. A. SAGER, Treasurer.

This page of personal history began with Lincoln. I close with his ringing words, good for all time: "Let us have faith that right makes might, and in that faith let us to the end dare to do our duty as we understand it."

A LATE CONFESSION

BY ELSIE SINGMASTER

HAVING described the Battle of Gettysburg and having escorted his passengers safely to the 5:33 train, Captain Hill stabled his horses. He had not spoken with his usual eloquence, and now as he worked a frown wrinkled his forehead. When he had finished, he did not go up the board walk to the kitchen and his wife's good supper, as was his custom, but stole down the alley to the corner, and then walked a block farther to the Palace Hotel, on whose porch he spent with his fellow-guides the idle hours when the trains brought no tourists.

With an air of anxiety and depression he mounted the steps and stood leaning against a post. He was a thin little man of uncertain age, neatly dressed in a blue suit, and wearing a bright-red necktie and on his lapel a bronze button. His red tie and his blue suit and his crisp white curls suggested the flag which he adored. He had been a private soldier, but the tourists called him Captain, and he never disclaimed the title, holding it to be a small distinction compared to that which he deserved.

Transportation over the battlefield was still by means of wagons, and he had many pleasant conversations with his patrons.

"You must have been very brave," they would say.

"Well, it took some grit," Henry always answered.

"How old are you?"

"Well, my pension papers say forty-five"—or "fifty-five," or "sixty-five," as the case might be. To-day he had said sixty-five with a little shudder. If ever a human being wished that Time's clock would stand still, that human being was Henry. His horror of appearing old had its source both in vanity and in a dread of weakness and senility. He had a curious conviction that one could cheat Time—a conviction more common among women than among men. He kept his shoulders straight and his clothing immaculate, and he walked with a brisk gait which was sometimes painful.

His wife, Hetty, felt no such horror; she spoke with incomprehensible indifference of growing old, confessing freely that she was almost seventy, and giving herself all the comforts of age—a nap in the afternoon, a seat by the stove when her tasks were done, and the wearing of clothes which had long ceased to be fashionable. She did not observe that to Henry the very subject of age was unpleasant, that he even left the room when it was mentioned. She did not know exactly how old he was when she had married him—they were both middle-aged, and she took him as he was and concerned herself little about his past, even about the number of years that he had lived.

It was the thought of Hetty which at this moment depressed her husband. Compelled by necessity, he was about to deal her a hard blow, to shake the foundations of her placid life.

He realized after he had leaned for fifteen minutes against the post that he could not stay here forever. Six o'clock had struck, the shades of the stores had been drawn, and the street was deserted. Trembling, he approached his dwelling. Once his step faltered, and several times his eyes grew dim. Once he stopped and stood in deep thought. Was it not tomorrow that the landlord was coming? No, it was this evening.

Exactly two weeks ago he had escorted over the field the Governor of North Carolina and his family. He was in fine spirits, the Governor and his family were pleasant and talkative, and Henry flattered himself that he had achieved that happy impartiality which made the battle seem a victory for both sides, and which would result in an addition to the usual fee. The addition was forthcoming, and Henry had the satisfaction of being complimented before all the other guides.

"You certainly told us an interesting story."

The Governor was the last to say farewell.

"How old are you, my friend?"

"My pension papers say sixty-five," said Henry, with a little shiver at this unpleasant query. He wished that his pension papers said thirty-five.

But the subject of age was again thrust before him. He saw with regret that the attention of the other guides was not directed to him, but was given to old Billy Gude, one of their number. Billy was excited.

"I tell you it helps me!"

"What helps you?" asked Henry.

"I get more pension—twenty dollars instead of fifteen." The tears stood in Billy's eyes. Neither he nor any of them was rich. Their business had seasons, like the millinery business, and all the uncertainties of a lottery.

"How so?" asked Henry, excitedly.

"If you do, I do."

"No, you don't."

"Why not?"

"You're not old enough."

"Not old enough?"

"No, the increase begins at seventy."

"Oh!" said Henry. He drew a deep breath. A hundred extra dollars a month could not pay one for being seventy!

He had gone slowly down the street and into his kitchen, conscious of the need of warm food and of an appreciative audience. He did not like Billy Gude, who was his professional rival.

But peace of mind was not to be his. He saw when they sat down at the table that Hetty was pale.

"What is the matter, Hetty?"

Hetty clasped her hands upon her breast. She was built after a generous pattern of soul and body and should have had a large family of children to care for in addition to one little man. Now tragedy was in her gesture and her voice.

"He's raised the rent on us, Pop!"

"How much has he raised it?"

"Five dollars."

"The scoundrel!"

"He made a new fence and papered and rebuilt the shed. I guess it is not too much."

Henry sensed dimly a coincidence. Ah, yes! five dollars a month was the extra sum which Billy Gude was to receive. He felt an unwarranted anger against Billy and a still more unreasonable anger against Hetty.

"Well, well!" he cried, testily. Then for the first time in his married life he roared at Hetty. He had a surprisingly deep voice.

"Don't be a cry-baby! Crying won't help it."

Hetty dried her eyes.

"When'll this raise begin?" demanded Henry in the same round tone. He spoke as an impertinent child might speak addressing an adult.

"He will come for the next rent two weeks from to-night."

When supper was over, Henry went upstairs and looked at himself in the mirror, as though to trace the ravages wrought by the announcement. He seemed terrified. After a while he went downstairs and out of the house, ignoring Hetty and her tears.

As he walked he planned and rejected plans. They had long expected an increase in the rent, and, as Hetty said, it was not unjust. But he had made no arrangements to meet it. He did not know how to meet it now. Their living expenses were almost nothing, and could not well be reduced. They dared not save less than they were saving; the possibility of having to discontinue his small weekly deposits in the bank was not to be considered.

There was one thing they could do—he faced the thought at last boldly. They could take a few rooms instead of a whole house. There were on the first floor a parlor, sitting-room, and kitchen. They could do with one room instead of three. On the second floor were three rooms. They needed but one, and they did not need an attic at all. The boldness which he felt was boldness not for himself but for Hetty. It was she who liked space; but what was the use of possessing space if you did not use it? With a long sigh he turned homeward, thankful that he need say nothing to Hetty to-night.

The bill for the increase in pensions was the chief topic among the guides. Business was not brisk the next morning; for instance, though the weather was pleasant, only half a dozen tourists arrived and all could be accommodated in one carriage. Billy Gude thanked Heaven loudly that he was seventy-one.

"I can live even if the ungrateful people don't care nothing for their country," he declared.

When Henry went home at noon, it seemed to him that Hetty looked at him suspiciously. He had racked his brains to think of another way of adding to his income. But work was scarce, especially work which could be done by an old man. There was a way of getting more money, even without earning it, but this method he could not consider.

In the middle of the afternoon he had suddenly a great fright. A few tourists had come in on the noon train and he had taken them to the summit of Round Top and stood there, his whip in his gesticulating hand.

"There in that tree a little sharpshooter sixteen years old was found dead. He had tied himself fast with his belt, he—"

Henry ceased to explain, he grew quite white and turned his horses homeward. His passengers perceived his haste and accused him of cheating them. When they reached the station, they paid his fee with loud objections.

Hurrying home, he discovered with deep relief that Hetty had gone out. He climbed to the attic like a thief and opened an old chest. Hidden under his clothing was a package wrapped in newspaper. This he carried downstairs and out into the yard, looking meanwhile constantly over his shoulder as though he feared pursuit.

But this strange performance did not set his heart at rest. In the same spot the next afternoon he grew pale, and again he hastened home. Now he took the package from the haymow and hid it under the seat of the carriage.

The following morning, as he drove round Culp's Hill, he left his passengers and crossed a meadow to Rock Creek. There he stood looking down into a pool deep enough to hide his package or even a larger object.

Hetty each day grew a little paler, but he did not see; indeed, he did not look directly at her. He believed that she resented his poverty; he feared that she suspected him of still another defect. She was the soul of honor, the never-failing advocate of straightforward dealing, and he had for many years deceived her grossly.

A week passed in misery; a second Sunday came and went. Henry believed sometimes that his mind was failing. Once he placed Rickett's battery on Culp's Hill, and once, delivering to Union tourists the story designed for Confederates, was sharply called to account. He could not bear to meet the look on Hetty's face when he told her that she would have to leave the little house where she had lived for so many years; the house to which her furniture seemed to have grown fast; the house which he acknowledged in moments of humiliation he should have been able to buy for her. He felt willing to sacrifice all things for her but one thing, to make it possible for her to stay by any means but one.

He realized at last that he must quicken his steps. A woman was watching his halting progress from her window; next thing she would suspect that he was not sober or, worse still, that he was failing. He could no longer postpone his announcement; the landlord would pay his visit immediately after supper. There was no trouble to find the ready cash to meet the first few payments—he had that in his pocket at this moment; the difficulty was to arrange a future budget. The sooner Hetty was told, the more merciful it would be.

When he entered the house, he was startled. He had reproached himself because he was keeping Hetty's good supper waiting, but there was no supper! The stove was cold, the table bare. Had she fled? Was she ill? Too frightened to move, he stood holding to the door-knob.

Then he heard a sound. Hetty was not dead, nor was she ill; he heard her stirring in the parlor. She was dear to him, even though for two weeks he had scarcely spoken to her. He forgot all other anxieties in his need to be assured of her existence.

He walked trembling toward the sitting-room and looked in. He saw there a strange picture. Hetty usually accomplished her cleaning in his absence; she never troubled him to help, as other men were troubled. When Mrs. Gude was cleaning house, Billy had sometimes to wash the dishes, and Jakie Barsinger, a lion among his mates, was set frequently to the washtub.

But now Hetty was cleaning in the evening, of all times! Her old clock, inherited from her grandfather, had been moved out from the wall and its pendulum lay upon the table; the ancient sideboard, beautiful in design, stood with empty drawers. Hetty appeared that moment in the parlor doorway, a Windsor chair in her arms. She had lost flesh, her cheeks drooped, there were tears in her eyes.

"What in the world does this mean?" asked Henry.

Hetty set down the heavy chair.

"I thought I would begin. This evening I will untack the parlor carpet, and these things had to come out."

"Untack the parlor carpet?" Had she seen into his mind and read there her fate?

"Well, I got to thinking what we could do to live, and it seemed that all we could do was to move. I am willing." The tears now ran in streams down her cheeks and dripped upon the bosom of her dress. "I don't want to make a fuss about it. It is just because I have been here so long."

Henry leaned weakly against the door frame. It would seem that the way to his announcement was prepared. A meaner man might have rejoiced because the suggestion that they move came from Hetty. But Henry was not mean. In his heart surged two opposing tides. He had promised to take care of her, but in the hour of trial she had leaned upon him as upon a broken reed. Finding him of no account, she had gone quietly to work to save the situation with the means at her command.

"I will try to make it pleasant in a smaller place," she promised. "I think we can get rooms over the grocery store, but I thought you would rather make the arrangements."

The tide threatened now to overwhelm Henry. She always had his dignity at heart. And this sacrifice need not be—the same was another means; the situation could be saved by a word, and the sideboard drawers could be filled, the Windsor chair be restored to its place by the parlor window, the pendulum be hung back again in the old clock. But he could not say the word; if he did, his enemy would have him by the throat. His logic was of a curious variety, but he believed that by confessing he would yield that which was precious as life itself, that which was actually life.

Hetty observed him pityingly.

"I will get your supper right away," said she. "I am sorry I am late."

Again Henry was deeply moved. She had always taken him at his own valuation; she had listened to him, spared him, accommodated herself to him, believed his every word. Her only thought was for him. Even now she did not suspect his perfidy. Her confidence weighted suddenly an evenly balanced scale. He crossed the room, brushing against her with apparent carelessness, and lifted the pendulum and hung it in place and turned the clock ahead. It was a symbolic act, though he did not realize it.

"This is nonsense!" he said, hoarsely. "Put your things back."

"What do you mean?" asked Hetty, faintly.

Henry turned and faced her. He was smaller than she in body and in mind and in soul, but now he achieved a moral victory greater than she had ever achieved because he had much farther to rise.

"My pension papers are wrong," he declared, hoarsely. "I am not sixty-five, I am seventy. I can have it fixed. You can put back your things. I am seventy."

Hetty thought he had lost his mind.

"It is true!" In his excitement his voice grew louder and louder and perspiration streamed down his cheeks. "The right age is in the family Bible." He almost added "in the wagon shed," but a kindly Providence saved him. He had meant to hide this, the sole testimony.

Hetty sat down heavily. He was, she thought, quite mad.

"They got it wrong on the papers and I—I just took that age."

Hetty put her hand to her head. He saw now where her difficulty lay.

"Those veterans who are seventy get five dollars more a month. There is a new bill. Don't you understand, Mom?"

"Oh!" cried Hetty. "Is it so, Henry?" She clasped her hands again upon her breast, but now the gesture was one of rapture. Then Hetty looked at him. She adored him as her rescuer; she wished to say the most completely satisfying thing wife ever said to husband. It is a pity that even our heroic deeds are sometimes so ill rewarded.

"Why, Pop," cried Hetty, "I never knew how old you were! I thought you were older than seventy!"

WEEKLY OUTLINE STUDY OF CURRENT HISTORY

BY J. MADISON GATHANY, A.M.

HOPE STREET HIGH SCHOOL, PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Based on The Outlook of May 21, 1919

Each week an Outline Study of Current History based on the preceding number of The Outlook will be printed for the benefit of current events classes, debating clubs, teachers of history and of English, and the like, and for use in the home and by such individual readers as may desire suggestions in the serious study of current history.—THE EDITORS.

[Those who are using the weekly outline should not attempt to cover the whole of an outline in any one lesson or study. Assign for one lesson selected questions, one or two propositions for discussion, and only such words as are found in the material assigned. Or distribute selected questions among different members of the class or group and have them report their findings to all when assembled. Then have all discuss the questions together.]

I—INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

A. Topic: The Treaty of Versailles.

Reference: Pages 102–104, 96–99.

Questions:

Note.—Read the references in the order indicated. 1. What evidences do you see in The Outlook's summary of the Treaty of Versailles that would justify one in believing that "no conference that ever assembled in the history of the world has been confronted with problems of such variety, of such perplexity, of such magnitude, and of such gravity"? 2. Write out a numbered list of the provisions which aim to deprive Germany of her military power. 3. In your opinion, do the terms of the treaty warrant the belief that Germany will hereafter be unable to harm her neighbors, and that the German military spirit will be crushed out? Discuss at length. 4. Give reasons for believing or not believing that the Treaty of Versailles leaves "nothing ahead of Germany but hard work, self-denial, and rigid economy." 5. Give a summary of The Outlook's belief that "it is not yet certain that the treaty presented to the Germans provides security for the future." 6. Why does The Outlook think that it is not yet certain that the treaty will lead the Germans to a consciousness of their guilt? 7. If Germany refuses to accept this treaty, discuss, what, in your opinion, this would teach the world about Germany, and outline what the Allies in such an event should do. 8. There are those who believe that the American Senate should accept this treaty without reservation. Write out your opinion of this position. 9. Others believe that the Senate should separate the Peace Treaty from the League plan, ratify the one and leave the other for future discussion. Tell what you think of this suggestion, submitting reasons. 10. If you wish to get an amazing picture of Prussian domination and Prussian brutality and thus secure an authentic foundation for judging the justice of the Treaty of Versailles, read Brand Whitlock's two volumes entitled "Belgium," published by D. Appleton & Co. (New York City).

B. Topic: Venizelos.

Reference: Pages 105–109.

Questions:

1. Pick out the statements and incidents in these pages which tend to prove that Venizelos is a wise and able statesman.

2. Give a summary of the treatment of the Greeks by Germany and Bulgaria. 3. What are the things Mr. Venizelos wants for Greece? For the new Balkans? Do you think he is unreasonable? Reasons. 4. Describe the political philosophy of the Premier of Greece as you gather it from what Major Barnes and Mr. Mason have written in these articles. Do you believe in it? Reasons. 5. Discuss whether it is right to "compromise a present advantage for a future good." Illustrate. 6. Name and discuss Greek contributions to civilization. Compare the contributions to civilization made by America with those made by Greece. See Morey's "Ancient Peoples," pages 294–296 (American Book Company).

II—NATIONAL AFFAIRS

Topic: The Birth of the American Legion.

Reference: Pages 104, 105.

Questions:

1. Give a brief account of the founding of the American Legion, including such points as place, time, membership, attitude, etc. 2. What are the purposes of this Legion? 3. Suggest to the Legion various ways by which each one of the Legion's purposes can be realized. 4. Give several reasons why it is very fortunate indeed that the American Legion is to be absolutely non-partisan and is not to be used for the spread of partisan principles or for the candidacy of any person seeking public office. 5. Explain what led Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., to say to Mr. Putnam: "We came here to put something in the Government, not to take something away from it." Give five reasons why this should be the attitude of every patriotic American citizen.

III—PROPOSITIONS FOR DISCUSSION

(These propositions are suggested directly or indirectly by the subject-matter of The Outlook, but not discussed in it.)

1. The United States Senate should accept the Treaty of Versailles without discussion. 2. The American school system stands greatly in need of an American Teachers' Federation. 3. Parliamentary government is more democratic than Congressional government.

IV—VOCABULARY BUILDING

(All of the following words and expressions are found in The Outlook for May 21, 1919. Both before and after looking them up in the dictionary or elsewhere, give their meaning in your own words. The figures in parentheses refer to pages on which the words may be found.)

Meticulously, abdication (97); abrogate, kilometer, plebiscite (102); conscription, maltreatment (103); renegade, affluence, uncanny, cadaverous (106); ism (104); partisan (105).

A booklet suggesting methods of using the Weekly Outline of Current History will be sent on application

THE FRANKLIN CAR

*A New National Average
14,500 Miles to the Set of Tires*

A NATION - WIDE investigation among Franklin owners has just been completed. It covered all types of the present model which have been driven day by day for over two years in every part of the country. The results show a delivery of over 14,500 miles to the complete set of tires.

When in 1916 the present chassis was put on the market, it was known that its lighter weight would give greater tire economy. Yet former figures of 10,000 miles were not changed in Franklin statements of performance, until owners' results were available. Franklin statements are based on facts, not on estimates.

This newly proved economy is just fresh evidence as to why the Franklin Car leads with the fastest growing sales and resales of any fine car.

Delivering frequently more than is quoted for it, and always more in comfort and everyday usability than the average car, Franklin performance drives home this fact : only Franklin light weight, flexible construction and direct air cooling (no water to boil or freeze) give motoring satisfaction approaching the ideal.

Towels & Bed Linens at McCutcheon's

THE present is a particularly opportune time to lay in a supply of Towels, Sheets, Pillow Cases and other house-keeping Linens for the town house and the country home.

In spite of the prevailing market shortage, "The Linen Store" is happy to announce very full stocks and helpfully moderate prices.

We cannot emphasize too strongly the impossibility of lower prices on Linens for another year at least. The destruction of machinery in Belgium and the failure to plant flax in Russia, make it certain that the world's supply of Linens will be far short of the demand for a long time to come.

The Luxury Tax does not apply to Linens

THE NEW BOOKS

This Department will include descriptive notes, with or without brief comments, about books received by The Outlook. Many of the important books will have more extended and critical treatment later

FICTION

Romantic Idar (The). By Lawrence Perry. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

A sprightly comedy-novel in which a mischievous suppression of the truth, having no evil intent, puts the characters at cross-purposes with one another. Amusing entanglements result, and when love follows flirtation ingenious methods have to be found to straighten things out and insure the inevitable wedding. Light and cheerful reading.

Shrieking Pit (The). By Arthur J. Ross. The John Lane Company, New York.

The fallacy of circumstantial evidence in which a link is missing is again shown by this skillfully planned murder mystery story told by one of the joint authors of the much-read "Hampstead Mystery."

Travelling Companions. By Henry James. Boni & Liveright, New York.

Short stories never before collected in book form. They are of Henry James's early period as a fiction writer, and therefore are simply and directly written. Few magazine stories of to-day surpass them in imaginative quality.

Why Joan? By Eleanor Mercein Kelly. The Century Company, New York.

The author's novel called "Kildares of Storm" made a favorable impression. So also will this new tale, the scenes of which are laid in Kentucky in the present day. The narrative is well told and the characters are pleasantly and carefully portrayed. Best of all, the talk of the characters has sparkle and point.

ART

Pictures of London. By Celebrated Artists. The Studio, Ltd., New York.

Pictures of Paris. By Celebrated Artists. The Studio, Ltd., New York.

People who know London or Paris will be delighted to own these books. The pictures are nicely printed on good paper, some of them in colors. Each book contains about fifty illustrations, mostly by English artists.

BIOGRAPHY

Letters of Algernon Charles Swinburne (The). Edited by Edmund Gosse, C.B., and Thomas J. Wise. 2 vols. The John Lane Company, New York.

For the average reader, interested in the main streams of literature rather than its remoter springs, this monumental work might have been compressed into one volume to advantage. Swinburne was not a great letter writer. There are here flashes of the brilliant talk and the passionate genius which his intimates marveled at, but there is also much that is unimportant or that relates to bygone matters.

New Elizabethans (The). A First Selection of the Lives of Young Men Who Have Fallen in the Great War. By E. B. Osborn. Illustrated. The John Lane Company, New York.

WAR BOOKS

Forty Days in 1914. By Major-General Sir F. Maurice, K.C.M.G., C.B. With Maps. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

General Maurice was long the literary liaison between the British army and the press. Despite his "Where was Blücher?" blunder when the German drive last spring was threatening disaster, he is a man of tact and knowledge. He commanded a British division in the Mons retreat and at the First Battle of the Marne. His study of forty critical days in August and September, 1914, is a valuable contribution to history and is written in a plain, untechnical way.

Little Gray Home in France (A). By Helen Davenport Gibbons. The Century Company, New York City.

This is a narrative of real experiences written in an intimate and convincing way. Mrs. Gibbons and her family lived in a chateau near St. Nazaire last year, and had unusual opportunities to see the American "doughboy" at close range. She tells us in a familiar and friendly way and with many incidents how our soldiers acted and behaved and what fine fellows they were, both as soldiers and as Americans.

Morals and Morale. By Luther H. Gulick, M.D. Introduction by Raymond B. Foadick. The Association Press, New York City.

The author's recent death robbed him of the opportunity of bringing the work to date. During the time which has elapsed since Dr. Gulick died, the Salvation Army, the Knights of Columbus, and the Jewish Welfare Board have supplemented the "Y" work abroad; the General Staff of the American Expeditionary Forces has done much in keeping our men from the traditional evils of army life; the moral conditions in all sections in Europe where our men are located are carefully watched; in France disreputable resorts are now out of bounds of American soldiers; and the American, British, and French armies have appointed an Interallied Council on venereal diseases which is co-ordinating various activities.

MISCELLANEOUS

Helping the Helpless in Lower New York. By Lucy Seaman Bainbridge. Introduction by the Rev. A. F. Schauffler, D.D. Second Edition. The Fleming H. Revell Company, New York.

This book is intensely human and helpful. It is not a treatise or a discussion of the theories of philanthropy, but a group of well-told stories and incidents in real life through which the need of sympathetic assistance is brought out strongly and sometimes really dramatically. No one can read these little stories, told with animation and based on personal experience, without wishing well to the work described. In another part of this issue of The Outlook will be found an article by Mrs. Bainbridge, the author of this book, which tells of her early humane efforts in our Civil War as a nurse and organizer. It is noteworthy that the author's interest and tact in "helping the helpless" should have extended over so long a period, and should include so much that has been of value in alleviating suffering and encouraging moral as well as physical development.

How These Farmers Succeeded. Edited by John R. McMahon. Illustrated. Henry Holt & Co., New York.

Sixteen farmers, each "the foremost exponent of crop raising, stock raising, or both," in as many great agricultural States, were selected to tell how they made their farms pay. The result is an inspiring book that every progressive farmer should own, read, and ponder.

Wool. By Frank Ormerod. Staple Trades and Industries. Edited by Gordon D. Knox. Illustrated. Henry Holt & Co., New York.

Cotton. By George Bigwood. Staple Trades and Industries. Edited by Gordon D. Knox. Illustrated. Henry Holt & Co., New York.

These two books, uniform in size and price, give clear, simple, and interesting accounts of the manufacture, marketing, and various uses of the staples described.

Ask Them

What They Want in June

Let us leave this Puffed Grain question to the folks you love to please. What do they like best? What is best for them?

That's what they should have—should they not?

Ask the Boy

what he likes best at breakfast. Serve him some Puffed Grain—a toasted, savory bubble-grain, and ask what he thinks about it.

But you know what boys think about these food confections. Such foods are irresistible.

Ask the Girl

what she likes best in bowls of milk. She will mention some Puffed Grains, probably.

They are crisp and toasted, airy, flaky—four times as porous as bread. So thin and flimsy that they fairly melt.

Ask the Man

what he likes with his berries. Let him mix Puffed Rice in once.

These fragile, nut-like tidbits blend delightfully with fruit. They add what crust adds to a shortcake.

Ask the Doctor

what he thinks of whole grains with every food cell exploded. Grain foods made by Prof. Anderson's process, so digestion is easy and so every atom feeds.

You know what he will say—that Puffed Grains are the ideal form of grain food.

Puffed Wheat      Puffed Rice
And Corn Puffs
Each 15c—Except in Far West

These foods seem made for summer—always ready, fascinating, easy to digest. Foods which seem confections, yet scientific foods.

Use like nuts in candy making and as garnish on ice cream. Scatter in your soups. Crisp and lightly butter for children to eat dry.

Thirty-seven Years Without Loss to Any Investor

YOUR INVESTMENTS IN THE EVENT OF DEATH

A MAN whose affairs are in such shape that in the event of his death his executor or administrator would know from his records precisely what his assets and liabilities are and where his assets are located has one very valuable characteristic of a good business man. Should you die at this moment, would your estate be in such a condition that your affairs could be settled without unnecessary loss, expense, or confusion and the estate distributed in accordance with your desires?

Are you sure that you know just what disposition would be made of your estate in the event that you should die without a will? Few people know exactly. The distribution differs in the various States. The chances are that your wife would not fare as well as you wish. Have you protected her by a will?

Even if the statute of distributions in your State provides for the disposition of your property in just the way you want, there is still a reason for making a will. If you die intestate, the probate or surrogate court appoints an administrator; if you leave a will, it appoints the executor named in your will to settle your estate. The court must require the administrator to give a bond, which will cost something, and, what is usually more important, the requirements of the surety company giving the bond will greatly complicate the settlement of affairs. If your will requests that your executor serve without bond, it would be a very unusual situation in which he would be required to give one, and, as far as the protection of the bond is concerned, an executor for whom you feel that a bond would be any real safeguard should not be named.

Though a simple will not creating any trusts is not a complex matter, there are formalities of execution and various aspects of the provisions of even a simple will that make it far safer to have the matter attended to by an attorney. His charge should not be large for a simple will. If you contemplate a complicated disposition of your property, it would be folly for you to attempt to draw your own will. Simple wills are very seldom "broken," but exceptionally complicated ones may raise difficult questions. An eminent New York lawyer recently had his will broken as a result of attempting a complex disposition of his estate.

Unless you are confident that your wife, or whoever you desire should receive the benefit of your property, has good business judgment and a sufficient knowledge of investments to be safe in handling the property, you will probably want to create a trust estate—that is, name a trustee who will take your property or as much of it as you wish, and invest it, and pay over the income to those you wish to enjoy it. You can also provide that your trustee shall pay over amounts of the principal in accordance with your directions, and eventually pay over all the principal to such beneficiary or beneficiaries as you designate.

Unless there is some individual who will be willing to serve, in whose honesty and sound judgment you have absolute confidence, whom you would prefer to a trust company by reason of his business skill and the personal relationships involved, then you should consider well the appointment of a trust company executor or trustee or one of two executors or trustees. Before the check can be cashed, he must sign his name again in the lower left-hand corner, in the presence of the person cashing it, who compares the two signatures, assuring identification and preventing use of the check by an unauthorized holder.

Take Guaranty Travelers Checks

WHEN you travel—taking all your funds in cash means taking the risk of loss. Taking a check book means depending on acquaintanceship. Taking Guaranty Travelers Checks means convenience, and safety for your funds.

Guaranty Travelers Checks can be cashed at leading banks throughout the United States. They are accepted in payment for transportation at the principal railroad offices and in settlement of accounts by hotels and business houses. They are as readily available as actual cash, yet can be used only by the rightful holder.

Abroad, these checks are also readily accepted by hotels and business houses. Unlike other travelers checks, as formerly issued, Guaranty Travelers Checks are not payable in foreign currency at a fixed rate, but are cashed by all leading banks at the best current rate of exchange, thus affording in most cases a greater equivalent in foreign money.

Guaranty Travelers Checks are inexpensive—the charge is at the rate of 50c. per $100. They may be obtained at your own bank.

most instances it is better not to have more than one executor, or at most two executors or trustees, as a larger number will probably complicate matters. Some States, such as New York, closely confine trustees in the investments they may make, and thus reduce the amount of income it might be possible to obtain in the interest of safety; other States, like Massachusetts, leave the trustee to his reasonable discretion as a fiduciary. In any event, if you give investing directions in your will, they govern; and in any jurisdiction your trustee will have as much latitude as you choose to give him.

If one is of advanced age, or in poor health, or engaged in an extra-hazardous occupation, such that death may be contemplated as something more than a remote contingency, it may be well to consider the investments one has made with a view to the situations which might be created by them in one's estate in the event of death. Undoubtedly, coupon bonds are the simplest of all assets of an estate. A Federal inheritance tax will be taken from your estate anyway if the estate is over $50,000. Most of the States have inheritance taxes, and if the inheritances of your estate are larger than the exemptions allowed—usually only a few thousand dollars at the outside, if any—an inheritance tax will have to be paid in the State in which you reside at the time of your death. The proper principle of taxation would tax tangible property (real estate and other tangible things) only in the State where it is situated, and intangible property (securities, etc.) only in the State of the residence of the owner.

Unfortunately, owing partly to the failure to grasp the principles of justice involved and partly to the desire to tax anything that can be reached, particularly property of a non-resident, many jurisdictions still exact an inheritance tax on the stock of corporations having property in the State owned by non-resident decedents. Some corporations are incorporated in several States, and a number of jurisdictions may exact an inheritance tax on account of the same stock. Even though the circumstances are such that no tax is actually payable, the amount of trouble involved in having the stock transferred will increase the expenses of administering the estate. The corporation or its transfer agency will not transfer the stock until it has permission to do so from the proper authorities of every State which claims a right to tax the inheritance. This means that extensive reports must be made to each State to determine the amount of the tax, or that there is no tax payable, and the necessary permission ("waiver" is the term used) procured for the stock to be transferred.

To give a simple illustration of the point, a man who purchased bonds of a corporation in the Province of Quebec insisted on having them registered. In registered bonds, however, one may experience the same inheritance tax difficulties as in stock ownership. This man had taken a boy into his household as a son (but not legally adopted) to whom he left all his property by will. On the death of the testator, New York, the State of his residence, of course taxed the inheritance, and the tax was much larger because it was to a collateral and not to a child or other very close kin. When the executor undertook to have the bonds transferred, the Province of Quebec stepped in and took a tax, which was also larger because of the collateral inheritance, and still further increased because the beneficiary was not a British subject. If the investor had kept his bonds in coupon form, all this accumulation of taxes in the second jurisdiction would have been saved.

The transfer of stock of a decedent estate is likely at best to involve a great deal of trouble which may well be considered in going over your securities with the thought of leaving them as quick assets at the time of your death. Just to indicate the trouble involved, the corporation or its transfer agent is likely to require all and must require some of the following: a "waiver" from each State which has jurisdiction over the corporation and may levy a tax; a certificate from the court which appointed the administrator or executor to the effect that the person named was appointed and is still acting; a copy of the will certified by the court which admitted it to probate. There may be even further requirements, which, added to the complexities of every stock transfer, make the transfer of decedent's stock especially a nuisance. The coupon bond is far less troublesome, and involves the payment of only those taxes which have a justification.

Highly speculative investments are especially dangerous in a decedent's estate. There may be a considerable lapse of time before the appointment of an executor or administrator, and a further delay before he learns what the assets and liabilities are, and during these periods there is no one to "watch the market" and protect the situation. Thin equities of any kind are dangerous. Your representative fiduciary (executor or administrator) probably will not be able to act as swiftly as you can

MAKE THE EARTH FREE TO THE USER

The editorial in The Outlook for April 9 entitled "Workingman—Capitalist—Middleman," states a truth, but not the whole truth. Its statement of the labor problem is excellent: "How ought the products of organized industry to be divided between these three groups, each of which is necessary to make it economically profitable?"

Your conclusion, too, is good: "It is contended, not without reason, that under the system which we have inherited from the past the capitalists and the middlemen have had too large a share of the profits of their combined industry. If so, then their share should be reduced and the share of the workingmen should be increased."

The method of lessening the profits of the middlemen now most popular with the farmers is for the latter to organize and assume the duty of distribution as well as of production. That application of the theory of co-operation has already begun in California and is being advocated in other sections of the country.

Of course if the modern power to combine can be so applied as to make the farmers collectively what at first they were individually, both middleman and workingman, it is conceivable that as a class they may be better off than at present. Getting two profits, instead of one, seemingly helps their situation.

But how about the "forgotten man"—the consumer? It makes little difference to him whether the cost of production and of distribution goes to one class or to two classes if the price to him is not reduced.

Another very important factor in industry is not alluded to in your editorial, and that is the monopolist and the royalties he receives. When a farmer buys his land or hires it of a speculator, he incurs a wrongful expenditure which cuts into his income, and therefore lowers his standard of living. The only advantage the one who owns his farm has over the tenant farmer is that the former may in time, as his land increases in value, himself become a speculator and get a royalty in addition to his wages.

The real remedy for the straitened circumstances of the workingman, the middleman, the farmer, and the consumer is a free earth. Get rid of the monopolist by turning the annual value of land and other natural resources into the public treasury, thereby making them free to the user and abolishing tax burdens; then every one who works or saves will receive just and abundant compensation.

3-in-One for Anglers

Fishing is fun if you use 3-in-One. This is the real oil for fine reels. No sticking, jerking, or back-lashing—makes all parts work with smooth, easy precision. Never gums or collects dirt.

3-in-One Oil keeps rust off steel rods, metal guides and joints. Preserves bamboo and cane rods. Preserves lines—prevents rotting. Makes lines reel right. Makes flies waterproof, so they always float. Try it.

3-in-One for Golfers

Try 3-in-One Oil on your golf clubs. Prevents rust forming on the metal parts. Also good for the wood—preserves it. Softens and preserves the leather grips, too. Wipe clubs free from dirt and moisture, then gently rub 3-in-One all over them. Tell the man at the club-house to try this, or do it yourself.

3-in-One Oil is sold at all stores—East of the Rocky Mountain States, 15c, 25c, and 50c in bottles; also in 25c Handy Oil Cans.

—or do you just pick it up?

Have you been reading this copy of The Outlook for what is really in it—or have you just been glancing through it? Do you read it, week after week, straight through from cover to cover—or do you just pick it up casually now and then in somebody else's home? Do you realize that this slim magazine that you hold in your hand can keep you more vitally in touch with the activity and thought of the world than any other periodical published—or do you merely say to yourself occasionally that if "you only had time" to read The Outlook "you could probably get a lot out of it."

Time? Can you name any other magazine that gives you as much as The Outlook does in as compact a form? Can you name any other magazine that is broader, fairer, more independent? Can you name any other magazine whose editorial opinions are squarer, more outright, or more clean cut?

More than 100,000 thoughtful, intelligent men and women apparently can't. They need The Outlook. So they subscribe to it. General Pershing, for instance, is one of them. Busy as he is, he finds that The Outlook, thorough and concise as it is, keeps him in touch with the weekly affairs of the world, interestingly and efficiently. General Pershing does not subscribe to The Outlook just for the fun of spending four dollars.

Probably you are one of this great army of Outlook enthusiasts. But if you're not, if you have been failing to keep your mind and your interests in touch with the great vital things that are happening on every side of you, every week of your life, then the first thing to do is to begin reading The Outlook now. And the simplest way to do that is to subscribe.

You may want other magazines—for amusement, for relaxation, for what not—but if you take pride in your mind you need The Outlook first.

This coupon and a four-dollar check or money-order will do the work. Tear it off, fill it in, and mail it. But do it to-day—now, as you are reading—before it slips your mind.

BY THE WAY

A new guide-book made in Germany but printed in the English language commends itself in a foreword as "serviceable to the British occupation troops." For their edification it prints this explanation of a legend of the Rhine:

Two Christian princes have taken a Christian virgin on a war of plunder and fought after some time for the possession of the same. A priest proposed that the virgin should be sacrificed to the Dragon living on the mountain. The virgin was fastened on the rock, and when the Dragon awoke he wanted to seize the same. Then the virgin presented him the holy cross, when the animal agglomerated in a lump and threw itself into the Rhine.

"Apropos of your recent reminiscences of Professor Royce," a subscriber writes, "I recall that he once told me that when President Wilson was first elected he wrote him a letter of congratulation, and added: 'I took occasion in my letter to point out that he need have no doubt of the sincerity of my congratulations, there being no conceivable favor that a President of the United States could confer upon a Professor in Harvard University.'"

A mail-order paper contains these advertisements, which offer balm to thirsty or near-thirsty souls:

TWO NEW TRIUMPHS. Lager Beer in Powder Form. The Alcohol Process for making Wines and Liquors.

WHY GO DRY when you can make Genuine Lager Beer for 14c. a Gallon? Not a near-beer or soft drink, but real sparkling, wholesome, thirst-quenching, frothy beer.

THE WORLD IS GOING DRY, but—Make your own Beer—the real thing! No guesswork with my process; no drugs or chemicals used. Send 25c. to-day for my process—you'll need it later.

Is it better for an auctioneer to knock down his lots in a hurry, in order to speed up bidding, or to dwell on the virtues of his wares in order to coax out an advance? The London correspondent of "American Art News" thinks the first method works better at high-class sales such as those held at Christie's. "All now proceeds in a state of breathless excitement," he says, "the bidding being so keen that sales are conducted at about double the speed of pre-war days; buyers must act with decision if they do not wish to lose their opportunities." As an instance of the success of this method, the sale of twelve Chippendale chairs for 880 guineas (about $365 each) may be noted.

A Negro who perhaps merits a distinguished service cross for his indirect assistance in winning the war is John Ward, of Goldsborough, North Carolina. His achievement is described in the "Daily Express." Thirteen of his eighteen sons were reported as in the Ninth and Tenth United States Cavalry, while his seventeen daughters were busily engaged in war work. Thirty representatives of one family helping to win the war! Among this man's thirty-five children were, it is stated, two sets of quadruplets and five pairs of twins.

The first attempt of the camera user to take a photograph often results in failure because he forgets to uncap his lens. A writer in the "Photo-Era," however, says he has often tried to get a picture without drawing the slide that covers the dry plate! He says of one such experience: "I set up my camera, posed my friends, and made six exposures. I took the plates to a dealer for development. The next day I hurried to his store to see my negatives. 'Well, are those plates good?' I asked, hopefully. 'The plates are fine,' he replied; 'but what did you do with the pictures on them?' When I finally regained control of myself, I realized I had made every exposure with the slide locked firmly in place."

A recently published book on the Civil War reprints this fine tribute to Lincoln from Stephen A. Douglas, a rival candidate for the Presidency: "Lincoln is the strong man of his party—full of wit, facts, dates, and the best stump speaker, with his droll ways and dry jokes, in the West. He is as honest as he is shrewd; and if I beat him, my victory will be hardly won."

"On reaching the banks of the Rhine I took off my O. D. shirt," says Lieutenant Puryear in his thrilling account of his escape from Germany published in the "Atlantic Monthly." The abbreviations suggest the need of a glossary of war contractions. O. D. means "olive drab;" M. S. E., also recently seen in print, means, we are informed, "Master Signal Electrician;" A. W. O. L., "absent without official leave;" N. F. O. F. W., "navy forces operating on foreign waters;" W. A. A. C., "Woman's Auxiliary Army Corps;" and so on.

The widow was bemoaning her loneliness to the young vicar, London "Answers" says; he was struggling desperately to escape the gathering toils, and a "spoonerism" saved him. "I have always been used to having a man about the house," the lady said, "and I can't get used to the quietness." "Oh, don't worry, don't worry," nervously responded the vicar; "you know, my dear lady, the wind is always tempered to the lorn sham."

"And herein it is that I take upon me to make such a bold assertion that all the world are mistaken in their practice about women; for I cannot think that God Almighty made them . . . so glorious creatures . . . with souls capable of the same accomplishments with men, and all to be only stewards of our houses, cooks, and slaves." This advanced doctrine, which in its climax sounds somewhat as if it were uttered in a present-day convention, was written, as is noted in a recent book on English literature, some two hundred years ago, by Daniel Defoe.

Here are two "Tonics and Sedatives" from the "Journal of the American Medical Association:"

"Your luncheons are always so successful, Mrs. Penrhyn-Paget. Do tell me how you select your menus?" "Oh, you see the doctor has given me a printed list of things I mustn't eat, and I choose the dishes from that."

"A coarse expression should be avoided at any cost."

Physician: "Well, madam, what seems to be the trouble?"

Patient: "The food, doctor, that I ate for dinner got turned around and did not know which way it was going, until it suddenly found itself back again at the point of entrance and passed out in great confusion."

A daily paper satirizes a contemporary's "enterprise" with this reprint of its supposed apology for a report of the death of William B. Jones while that gentleman was still alive:

Yesterday we were the first newspaper to publish the news of the death of Mr. William B. Jones. To-day we are the first to deny the report. The "Morning Star" is always in the lead.

Music that is more than a memory

The Victrola makes the opera and the concert more than a fleeting pleasure. It brings them right into your own home, there to be enjoyed as your permanent, priceless possession.

You can have encores without number. You can hear the interpretations by the very same artists who won your admiration at the opera or concert—for the world's greatest artists make records for the Victrola.

Victors and Victrolas $12 to $950. There are Victor dealers everywhere, and they will gladly play any music you wish to hear and demonstrate the Victrola. Saenger Voice Culture Records are invaluable to vocal students—ask to hear them.

Victor Talking Machine Co., Camden, N. J., U. S. A.

Important Notice. Victor Records and Victor Machines are scientifically coordinated and synchronized in the processes of manufacture, and their use, one with the other, is absolutely essential to a perfect reproduction.

Swoboda To-Day

Creator of Conscious Evolution

A Remarkable Personality

by Jungary Russ

Swoboda, himself, is perhaps the most perfect example of what Conscious Evolution can accomplish. As Swoboda gains in years, he grows younger in enthusiasm, younger in vitality, younger in health; he is becoming stronger, more energetic, more confident, more dominant and more alive by capitalizing the creative powers through Conscious Evolution. What Swoboda is accomplishing for himself, you too can accomplish—every individual can accomplish, for every individual is governed by the same laws and principles, and every individual has it within himself to make use of these laws and principles. Swoboda's mind and body are so alert and so active that in his presence one feels completely overpowered. His personality dominates everything with which it comes in contact; yet Swoboda is real!—there is absolutely nothing mysterious about him. He knows not what fatigue is—he is a tireless worker. He delights in making sick people well and weak people strong. He loves his work because he feels he is of benefit to humanity—making a better, more vital, more potent race of men and women. Swoboda is not only a mental superman, but a high powered physical dynamo, an unheard of combination.

SWOBODA means freedom—liberty—Independence and SWOBODA aims to give these symbols of evolutionary states a new, higher and ultimate meaning.

In addition to SWOBODA'S amazing power of mind and body, his predominating characteristic is his intense sincerity.

Swoboda's discoveries are your opportunities

Daily Results:

"A year ago I was down and out financially and physically. I was a wreck. Conscious Evolution gave me power of mind and health. I am to-day better than ever and I am more prosperous than ever. Naturally I am a believer in the Swoboda idea."

"Your system makes me feel like a different person. Every one whom I have ever met who has tried it out, has the same thing to say about it. Was talking to a man to-day whose wife is a Swoboda enthusiast."

"Your system is direct, simple, scientific, effective, and makes one feel so invigorated. As an athlete and a physician, I endorse Conscious Evolution unreservedly. It is, and more, what is claimed for it."

"Conscious Evolution has given me surprising results. I expected good results but I am surprised."

"I feel very much better. You did me more good in three weeks than four doctors did in sixteen months."

"Your course has been of great benefit to me. I am able to do a great deal more work with less fatigue. My pleasures are also increased; all work seems a pleasure now."

"When your first letter of instructions reached me I was tired and blue. I read it and saw the 'light.' My blues disappeared. I used my energies for about ten seconds, and my tiredness left me. Conscious Evolution is increasing my every power of mind and body as I wish and as you promise."

If I Could Meet

I know that I could in less than one minute demonstrate to you that you are only one half as well, strong, vigorous, dynamic and energetic, and only half as brave, authoritative, forceful, dominant, self-reliant, daring, courageous, and merely half as progressive, masterful, aroused, powerful and creative as you easily may become through quick evolution.

Why Be Satisfied With Inferior Life?

Why be satisfied or content with inferior vitality, inferior health, inferior energy, inferior digestion, inferior heart power, inferior lung power, inferior nerve power, inferior brain power, inferior memorizing power, inferior reasoning power, inferior sensing power, inferior scheming power, inferior business power, inferior conscious power, and inferior personal power? Why not attain the vital power of supremacy?

Perfect and Vital Health

Conscious Evolution can give you perfect health in your nervous system, perfect health in your heart, perfect health in your lungs, perfect health in your stomach, perfect health in your digestive system, perfect health in your liver, perfect health in your kidneys, perfect health in your muscles, perfect health in your brain, and thus Conscious Evolution can give you perfect health in every cell, in every tissue, in every gland, and in every organ, as well as perfect health in your blood.

How to "Get There"

Regardless of how old you are—regardless of your years—you can grow younger in body, younger in spirit, younger in ambition and younger in every characteristic that gives greater living power, greater earning power and greater pleasure power. You can gain thinking power, reasoning power, health power and pleasure power, as you may desire.

Why Miss the Super-Pleasures?

Why not enjoy yourself as others enjoy themselves who are more highly alive and who have super-energy, super-health, super-vitality and super-powers of every character? Why deny yourself the keenest of pleasures? Why miss the extreme joy of life? Why miss the super-pleasures?

How To Gain What You Want

The way for you to gain what you want is by increasing your power of mind and body evolutionarily, so as to compel conditions to yield to your superior and irresistible energies. Conscious Evolution is the easy and sure means of making yourself supreme.

You Face to Face

More Daily Results:

"I indeed realize what physiological gladness means. My sensation of physical enjoyment is wonderful. It seems too good to be true. It is something as I felt when I took my first trip to the Bermudas, where nature has combined the blending of dainty coloring so exquisite that nothing short of fairyland can describe it. This is how Conscious Evolution causes me to feel."

"I can honestly say that the benefits I have received from Conscious Evolution cannot be measured by any payment of money, and I can say unhesitatingly that your system far exceeded my fondest hopes."

"I could see the tremendous reality and possibilities of Conscious Evolution in less than half a minute's direction of my energies into creative channels."

"Conscious Evolution has changed me from an invalid into a tireless human machine."

"I would not consider trading the benefits I have received from Conscious Evolution for gold."

"As a student of physiology and histology, I at once recognized the feasibility of Conscious Evolution."

"Ten seconds from the time I started Conscious Evolution, I felt myself more alive and energetic."

"I have used Conscious Evolution for a few weeks, and I find myself marvelously improved in both body and mind. Conscious Evolution is wonderful, and the world will be brighter when men and women everywhere grasp it."

"I owe my rise from the position of a country insurance agent to virtual head of one of the largest insurance companies of the world entirely to the power of personality Conscious Evolution has given me."

These Rare and Amazing Books Explain Conscious Evolution

Write for these books—not because Conscious Evolution has meant so much to 325,000 other men and women, not because there is scarcely a prominent family in the country that hasn't at least one member a pupil of Swoboda, but because they contain valuable ideas for you.

Conscious Evolution is being personally used by many of the most prominent physicians and by such men as Charles E. Hughes, Woodrow Wilson, the Rockefellers, the Vanderbilts, the Goulds, the Huntingtons, the Cudahys, the Swifts, the Armours and McAdams for advancing themselves in energy, health, vitality and power of personality.

Write for these books because they mean so much to YOU in multiplied living power, earning power and personal power. They are big books filled from cover to cover with vital facts about yourself and how you can acquire the degree of perfection in body and mind that you so much need. They explain the dangers of excessive deep breathing, excessive exercise, and excessive muscular development. CONSCIOUS EVOLUTION and THE SCIENCE OF LIFE show how to double or even treble your power of mind and body; not by tedious, prolonged study, but by a simple and quick process of energization which raises the very level of your life and mental powers, through harnessing your internal "CREATOR."

CONSCIOUS EVOLUTION and THE SCIENCE OF LIFE supply the key to dominant personal power, dominant business power, dominant success power, dominant mental power and dominant will power. They show how to change your aimless and fruitless attitude into ambition, inspiration, enthusiasm and the highest success by putting your internal "CREATOR" to work for you.

These books show how to amazingly increase your power of will and personality, as well as your power of body, for every action and for every purpose and process.

Conscious Evolution is a new science, and no one can afford not to know at least the simple facts about it. These facts show how Conscious Evolution overcomes weak will, poor health, feebleness of mind and body. They show how to overcome the inferior, pleasureless, feeble and unsatisfactory life, by giving the means to the successful, superior and abundant life through activating your "CREATOR."

Conscious Evolution also shows how to arrest the ageing of the body, and how to remain young, energetic, vigorous, well and active all of the days of your life, through self-re-creation. These books are absolutely free and there is no obligation now or after. These books are yours to keep, that you may attain a higher understanding of yourself and of evolution and the means to a higher existence.

Even if you gain but one idea through CONSCIOUS EVOLUTION and THE SCIENCE OF LIFE, these books will be of great help to you.

Just write your name and address on this corner and tear it off and mail it, and you will receive the books free. Attend to this today. You will surely forget about it if you put it off until tomorrow.

ALOIS P. SWOBODA

From a sickly youth Swoboda made of himself a magnificent physical specimen of the human race. This was just the beginning—his greater evolution was yet to come.

Conscious Evolution must not be confused with Darwinian evolution or Physical Culture. Nor should Conscious Evolution be confused with Oriental or Hindoo philosophies, auto-suggestion, self-hypnosis, gymnastics, or mere physiology, anatomy, histology, theosophy, morphology, medicine, pathology, exercise, New Thought, Christian Science, calisthenics or psychology.

Conscious Evolution is not an occult science, nor a metaphysical science, nor a divine science, nor a spiritual science, nor a material science, nor is Conscious Evolution a symbolic science, nor a mere hoping, wishing, longing and dreaming philosophy.

Conscious Evolution must not be confused with any present-day philosophies or sciences of a material or mental character.

Conscious Evolution cannot be understood by physicians, psychologists, physical culturists, philosophers, chemists, cosmologists or biologists of the present day.

Conscious Evolution is a new and original science, an exact science, a demonstrable science—a science of the evolution of and through Conscious Energy—a science of the Ultimate.

Conscious Evolution is the beginning of a new evolutionary era for the human race.

How to write, what to write, and where to sell.

Cultivate your mind. Develop your literary gifts. Master the art of self-expression. Make your spare time profitable. Turn your ideas into dollars.

Courses in Short-Story Writing, Verification, Journalism, Play Writing, Photoplay Writing, etc., taught personally by Dr. J. Berg Esenwein, for many years editor of Lippincott's Magazine, and a staff of literary experts. Constructive criticism. Frank, honest, helpful advice. Real teaching.

for many years editor of Lippincott's Magazine, and a staff of literary experts. Constructive criticism. Frank, honest, helpful advice. Real teaching.

One pupil has received over $5,000 for stories and articles written mostly in spare time—"play work," he calls it. Another pupil received over $1,000 before completing her first course. Another, a busy wife and mother, is averaging over $75 a week from photoplay writing alone.

There is no other institution or agency doing so much for writers, young or old. The universities recognize this, for over one hundred members of the English faculties of higher institutions are studying in our Literary Department. The editors recognize it, for they are constantly recommending our courses.

We publish The Writer's Library. We also publish The Writer's Monthly, especially valuable for its full reports of the literary market. Besides our teaching service, we offer a manuscript criticism service.

Camp Penn is a camp that boys come back to! It is not a military camp. We are sure that formal military training DESTROYS a boy's resourcefulness and initiative. We endeavor to build these up—by physical training, simple kinds of field engineering (we are going to duplicate 3 or 4 of the Argonne foot-bridges!), by all kinds of games and outdoor sports, and by real wood-craft and camp-craft.

We stand for character, strong physiques, good citizenship, and a bang-up good time! May we send you data?

Lobster

—direct from the sea to you

"Second to None" is the standard I have set for my goods. Anything we send you must match up to this in your estimation—or it will cost you nothing.

Because my lobster is put up when it comes from the lobstermen's pots is why it is so fresh and crisp, and so different from the ordinary kind. It's just like lobster freshly boiled from the shell.

"OUT here in the middle west," wrote one of our good customers, "we meat-eaters think there is no food in the world like lobster. It's a sea-shore treat we inland folks are denied. Can't you send us some lobster?"

I sent the lobster. And because so many people have declared my lobster to be the best lobster they have ever eaten, I am now giving other folks the opportunity to have it at home, and to try it, at my expense, before they buy.

Maybe you, too, would rather have fresh lobster than anything else to eat. No salad quite "touches the spot" like lobster salad. And so simple to make. Just chill a package of Davis' lobster in your ice-box; cut in half-inch cubes; arrange on a bed of crisp, white lettuce; mayonnaise all over; garnish with hard-boiled egg, and, if you wish, a dash of paprika—and then—my, how good it tastes!

For the "shore-dinner" at home; for lunch or picnic; anywhere, anytime—nothing is half so good as fresh-tasting, sea-flavored lobster. It's the handiest, most delicious food you can have in the house, and so truly distinctive!

Yes, my lobsters come all alive from the sea. The big, fresh, juicy, whole claw and body pieces are prepared and packed with the real lobster flavor left in. There is the same difference between the ordinary kind of lobster and mine as between green-picked strawberries and the ripe, luscious, flavorful berries from your own garden.

Guaranteed? I do even better than that. I send it to you free of all shipping charges—to try. If you are not so satisfied that you will want to order not only more lobster, but also some of my other sea-foods, you can send back what you haven't sampled, and I'll stand all the expense.

Inland folks can't get choice salt-water fish. That's what started me in business 33 years ago. Today I am supplying 100,000 families with sea-food right from the ocean. And I can furnish you (I never sell to dealers) with lobsters just like the lobster we have for ourselves here at Gloucester.

So now read the coupon down at the corner of this advertisement, sign and mail it, and I'll send you—all express charges prepaid east of Kansas—the best "lobster feed" (as we say here at Gloucester) you ever put your tooth to. Get the request started today.

Here is our plant at Gloucester. The fishermen tie up their boats right at my "side-door." The cream of all sea-food is delivered direct from here to no-one but families throughout America—every ounce guaranteed.

FREE—Lobster Sandwich Filling

If you accept this offer in time, I'll include, without charge, a full-sized can of my Lobster Sandwich Filling—the most delicious spread for crackers or bread. I want you to know its goodness.

The photographs herewith show various sections of the famous Lincoln Highway in the States of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Ohio and Indiana, which have been treated with Tarvia. Note the smooth, dustless, easy-traction surface—and remember that your community can have these all-the-year-round roads at very low cost.

Good highways should be continuous!

We should have continuous highways available the year 'round. Traffic should continue to operate in winter as well as in summer. Economic development demands this.

Mr. Roy O. Chapin, Chairman of the Highways Transport Committee, says:

These main highways must be brought into a comprehensive system—patterned as the railroads have patterned their systems, striving to connect population and shipping centres with regions of natural resources—agricultural, mineral, etc. Permanent surfaced highways must be built and maintained sufficient to withstand the strain, and carry the traffic of the future.

Of what use to National highways transportation are certain good sections of road, if some communities persist in their neglect to improve and properly maintain the connecting links?

The facilities for motor car and truck transportation are already far ahead of the roads. This neglect of road improvement, therefore, is putting obstacles in the path of rapid national economic development.

The one economical method of making and maintaining highways is Tarvia-macadam construction.

Plain water-bound macadam is no longer strong enough for heavy-traffic highways, but Tarvia-macadam will stand the wear and tear of speeding automobiles and giant motor trucks.

The initial cost of a Tarvia road is a little more than that of ordinary water-bound macadam, but the great saving on maintenance more than offsets the difference in first cost. Indeed, many communities are now using Tarvia on all their principal roads to save money.

Communities that already have plain macadam roads that are beginning to show wear will find that a prompt surface application of the appropriate grade of Tarvia will arrest their deterioration and greatly prolong their life, and at much less expense than by any other method.

Illustrated booklet describing the various Tarvia treatments free on request

JUNE 4, 1919

THE TRIUMPH OF AIRPLANE OVER OCEAN

AN event comparable only with the first crossing of the Atlantic by a steamship or the laying of the first Atlantic cable was recorded on Tuesday, May 27. Lieutenant-Commander Albert C. Read in his plane the NC-4 flew the eight hundred miles from Ponta Delgada in the Azores to or near Lisbon, in Portugal. The fact that in the first "leg" of the flight the NC-4 was held up for a day or more adds to the special interest in her triumph. She was fortunate enough to escape the fog which baffled and injured her comrades NC-1 and NC-3. That the first air-crossing of the Atlantic should have been made by Americans in an American plane will long gratify our National pride. The country is enthusiastic in congratulations to our Navy, to the gallant commander of the NC-4, to the builders of plane and engines, and to all who have taken part in the carefully planned preparation which has made this victory possible.

THE RESCUE OF HAWKER AND GRIEVE

The thrilling news that Hawker and Grieve, the bold aviators who attempted to cross the Atlantic in an airplane with a single engine, and whose death had been accepted as practically certain by every one, had been rescued by a tramp steamer, was received on both sides of the water with the utmost joy and relief. A few hopeful persons, and foremost among them Mr. Hawker's wife, had still maintained hopes that just what did happen would happen, but to most people the chance seemed so slight that the surprise was extreme. Hawker himself declares: "The risk wasn't so great as people thought. It was a perfectly straightforward attempt to fly over, not a do-or-die enterprise."

The story of the flight, failure, and rescue has been told simply and with no attempt at sensationalism by Hawker and Grieve. It is evident that almost from the first they encountered trying conditions of air and wind; but the fatal trouble was neither because of those difficulties nor because of the failure of the engine itself, but because of trouble with the radiating system. Yet it was still possible to navigate, and after about twelve and one-half hours' flying from the start it was decided to do the only sensible thing, namely, to fly toward the nearest part of the ocean in which ships might be encountered. This plan was carried out with the greatest success, for in two and one-half hours the Danish steamship Mary was sighted and was signaled by Hawker, and the airplane was brought to the water near the ship and the aviators rescued by the crew after they had been on the water an hour and a half. They were about 750 miles from Ireland at the time of their rescue.

The whole story is one of courage, of efficiency, and of modesty. The risk taken was exceedingly great, but the outcome shows that coolness and resourcefulness played a large part in the adventure, as well as sheer bravery. It is one of the traits of human nature to admire and applaud such men as these, who are not deterred by the elements or by danger from accomplishing that upon which they have set their minds. The reception to Hawker and Grieve in England could not be more enthusiastic if their victory had been over armies instead of over the elements.

CANADA'S LABOR TROUBLES

Something that appears in certain particulars much like Bolshevism has arisen in Canada. It started in Winnipeg on May 15. There was a dispute between three employers and their employees. For reasons which are widely regarded as unjustifiable, the employers refused, we understand, to deal collectively with their employees. As collective bargaining is the keystone of organized labor, this refusal enlisted on the side of the employees involved in the dispute all the trade-union leaders. As a result, there were sympathetic strikes which developed into an approximately general strike in the city. Taking advantage of the situation, the Radicals or Reds tried to turn the strike into a sort of revolution. A strike committee undertook to establish what seems a very close approach to a "dictatorship of the proletariat." This committee issued permissions to operate restaurants, theaters, bakeshops, and to make deliveries of bread and milk. There was thus the beginning in Winnipeg of soviet rule. Like the Russian soviet, which is a council of manual laborers, and usually soldiers, this committee purposed to assume governmental functions. Among the strikers were telegraph operators, postal employees, and printers. For a while telegraphic and mail communication was interrupted or seriously delayed and daily newspapers were suspended.

Within ten days the strike spread to other centers. Winnipeg, being a large and thriving industrial and railway center, capital of Manitoba, affects the life of a large region. Workers in Regina, capital of Saskatchewan, the next province to the west, and Edmonton, capital of Alberta, next province beyond to the west, and Calgary, the largest city in Alberta, joined in the strike early last week; and forty-seven unions in Toronto also voted to strike sympathetically.

According to reports from the various centers involved, it seems clear that the Bolshevik element is not making much headway. On the contrary, the local, provincial, and Dominion governmental authorities have succeeded in maintaining sovereignty. There has been little, if any, serious disturbance. There has been no indication, so far as we have learned, that any soldiers have been employed to break the strike, or that there has been any intention to use armed men for that purpose; but the militia has been on hand ready for emergencies. So far order has been maintained by the usual civil agencies, such as the police. The cards on the bread and milk wagons and the theaters reading, "By permission of the strike committee," were ordered taken down by the Provincial Government and City Council, and soon disappeared. Newspapers have resumed publication with limited editions. Citizens of Winnipeg of all classes took the places of some of the striking postal employees and sorted mail. After a warning that those postal employees who did not return to work before noon on Monday, May 26, would lose their places in the Federal service and new employees would be engaged, a large majority of the postal employees refused to return.

Two aspects of this strike have special significance. One is that large numbers of the strikers have no grievance against their employers, and many of them have struck in violation of agreements by which they were morally bound. This means that large numbers of wage-earners in Canada believe that what is the fight of one group of workers is the fight of all groups. It is a strike which has behind it a very considerable "class consciousness." The strongest statement about this which we have seen was made by Mr. A. McGovern, General Chairman of the Canadian Pacific Trainmen. His statement is the more significant because he is also Chairman of the Legislative Board of the Trainmen of Canada. Speaking for the trainmen, he said: "We are in warmest sympathy with the demand for an eight-hour day. We have that ourselves, and we think that every one should have it." But he also added: "There is no possibility of a strike of the trainmen in sympathy with the Winnipeg trades. We do not do business that way at all. We are negotiators all the time, and believe in conciliation." The other significant aspect of this strike is that it has shown signs of Bolshevism. There have been very wild and revolutionary statements made in connection with the strike; and there has been an attempt to set up government by soviet.

There is no likelihood, in our judgment, that real Bolshevism will gain much headway on this continent. The free institutions of Canada and of the United States work much better than anything that has been devised by the Bolsheviks of Russia. Freemen will not barter their liberty for bread, and they will be inclined to laugh at those who propose that they give up their liberty and then get no bread into the bargain. That is what has happened in Russia. It is not going to happen here. What the Canadian strike indicates is the depth and extent of industrial unrest. That is something that cannot be suppressed. Those who try to suppress it will suffer. It comes partly as the result of the war, but it was evident before the war. The spirit that causes it made men fight for ideals of freedom and will make them strive for ideals of freedom in times of peace. The chance for more life and for more opportunity to direct their life themselves is what men want. The Canadian strike is a warning to statesmen and to men in positions of industrial power that they must use the best brains that they can command for making the processes of producing wealth and the distribution of wealth more equitable.

THE ORGANIZATION OF CONGRESS

In both houses of Congress there has been a struggle within the Republican party, which is the majority party in each chamber.

In the House of Representatives the struggle was not primarily between two party factions, for the question involved transcended party questions. Mr. James R. Mann was candidate for Speaker of the House. It was Mr. Mann who, in March, 1916, expressed the hope that we should never have to be put to "the test whether we have to fight because some fool had entered upon a joy ride or voyage." This attitude toward American rights, an attitude of contentment, made Mr. Mann's candidacy itself a test of Americanism; and it was a test which the Republicans of the House met by electing as Speaker, not Mr. Mann, but Mr. Gillett, of Massachusetts.

In the Senate, on the other hand, the struggle was one between so-called conservatives and progressives. The group recognized as progressives does not include all Republican Senators who are in general in sympathy with the progressive movement. They are rather an insurgent group. They include such men as Senators Cummins of Iowa, Johnson of California, Borah of Idaho. Their opposition, in the organization of the Senate, has been directed chiefly against the plan to make Senator Penrose Chairman of the Finance Committee, and Senator Warren, of Wyoming, Chairman of the Appropriations Committee. It was also in a measure directed to the securing of important chairmanships for men who were out-and-out progressives. Both Mr. Penrose and Mr. Warren have been recognized as members of the Old Guard, and their opposition to progressive measures is remembered. The result of the contest in the Senate has been wholesome. It has not displaced either Mr. Penrose or Mr. Warren, but it has shown the strength of the insurgent group, and it has served notice upon the stand-pat element in the party that it cannot count on having its own way simply by trusting to the theory that, no matter what happens, the Republicans will win in 1920.

THE PRESIDENT ON PROHIBITION

By recommending the repeal or amendment of the war-time Prohibition Act so that the manufacture and sale of light wines and beer may be permitted, the President has raised a great outcry of protest from several quarters. Denominational assemblies have voted their disapproval, and those who have been working ardently for National prohibition have announced their intention to oppose any measure in Congress designed to carry out the President's recommendation. At present it does not seem likely that Congress will repeal or amend the Act.

There are some people who regard the President's suggestion as skillful politics. If the law stands, as it seems likely to do, his recommendation will not be held up against him by the Prohibitionists because it will have had no practical effect, while it will probably count in his favor with those who wish to see the ban against wine and beer lifted, for at least it can be said that he did all that it was possible for him to do. We prefer, however, to interpret the President's recommendation as a genuine attempt to treat the law as a strictly war measure, intended, as is stated in the law itself, to further the prosecution of the war, and therefore a measure not to be kept in force when the alleged occasion for its enactment has ceased.

There are, however, good reasons for continuing the law in effect. Though the need for making munitions, and therefore the need for promoting efficiency in their manufacture, has ended, the war itself is not yet nominally over, and certainly the conditions of peace are not yet fully restored. Many measures enacted like this under the war powers of Congress are still in operation and must continue to be for some time to come. Furthermore, the Prohibition Amendment to the Constitution goes into effect on the 16th of next January, and when that happens the sale and manufacture of intoxicating beverages will be contrary to the supreme law of the land. It is within the power of Congress, we believe, to pass an act interpreting the word "intoxicating" in the Constitutional Amendment as not applicable to wines and beer of a certain percentage of alcoholic content; but it is also possible under the present law for a court to determine what percentage of alcoholic content renders a beverage intoxicating, and that question is now before the Federal courts for decision. Under the war-time prohibition law, if a Federal court decides, for example, that two per cent or 2.75 per cent alcoholic content does or does not render a beverage intoxicating, then Congress would have a precedent on which to base its legislation. This it could not have if the law were repealed, for repeal of the law would, we assume, take the case out of the courts. If, on the other hand, Congress decides, no matter what verdict the court renders, to make prohibition absolute against all beverages containing even a trace of alcohol, then we cannot see any advantage in allowing the sale of wines and beer for six months and then following that with absolute prohibition.

One thing ought to be kept in mind in all this—that there is no question raised as to the prohibition of distilled liquors. Whisky, brandy, and the like will become on July 1 illegal beverages, and there is no suggestion made that under the Prohibition Amendment they will be restored in any degree to a legal status.

There is every reason, therefore, in our opinion, why the war-time Prohibition Act should not be repealed, even if it were to be modified, for the Constitutional Amendment will make the manufacture and sale of whisky, brandy, and the like illegal anyway, and there is no reason for reopening that question now.

GERMANY COMPLAINS

In response to the request of Count von Brockdorff-Rantzau, the Council of Four of the Peace Conference granted to the Germans an extension of time in which they might make their replies in full to the peace terms. The extension will have expired before this issue of The Outlook reaches its readers.

Some of the replies of the Germans to various portions of the peace terms have been presented and the Allies have made their answers. Most of the complaints of the Germans are of the sort which we have already reported, and the nature of the Allies' replies is obvious enough, it would seem, to be understood by any people less blinded by arrogance than the Germans have proved themselves to be. Germany complains that as she has been transformed within two generations from an agricultural to an industrial state, she can support her population only by trade and commerce. By the terms of the Treaty she will have lost raw material for use in her industries, will be hampered in the importation of raw material, and will be deprived of ships with which to carry on commerce. She complains that she will be pushed back in her development a half-century. To these complaints the answer is made, with astonishing patience, that Germany deprived the world of shipping to the amount of thirteen million tons, while she is being called upon to repay only four million tons; that Germany destroyed the Lens coal fields and can hardly complain at the consequent shortage of coal that she will have to suffer if she makes good what she destroyed; that in suffering the consequences of the war which Germany began the German population is only undergoing what the people of all the countries in the war will have to undergo.

It is astonishing enough that the Germans after raiding and destroying should complain because they have to suffer. What causes something more than mere astonishment, what justifies in all decent people a sense of outrage and indignation, is the echo of these German complaints that one hears in some quarters of America. Of course Germany counted on impressing by her complaints certain people in the Allied countries who call themselves radicals. Whatever injustice there is in the Treaty, so far as its main and general provisions are considered, is injustice not to Germany but to those whom Germany has robbed and despoiled. If justice had been the sole object of that Treaty, its terms would have been far severer than they are. Throughout it is evident that justice has been tempered by a desire for reparation, that is, by the intention to keep Germany strong enough to enable her to pay more than she would be able to pay if she were dealt with according to her deserts.

The Germans are continuing to hint that they may not sign the Treaty. On the other hand, reports come to this country that measures are being taken by the Allies to advance into Germany in case the German Government refuses to sign. Instead of complicating matters, that might really simplify them. In the end it might prove easier and more expeditious to deal with the various German states separately than with a single German government that cannot be trusted to observe its pledges. The Germans must see this themselves. It seems, therefore, probable that the present or another German Government will ultimately sign the Treaty. Even then the task of the Allies will not be ended; for it will lie with them to see that the Treaty is enforced.

THE JEWS IN POLAND

One valuable result which should follow the "day of mourning" observed by Jews impressively in many large cities in the United States on May 21 should be a public sifting of the charges and denials of massacres or pogroms from which the Jews, as declared by their leaders, have suffered in Poland. For some time there have been reports and contradictions of such outrages, and it is impossible for the ordinary American, as the matter stands now, to form a clear and positive opinion. Mr. Charles E. Hughes, Mr. Jacob Schiff, Mr. Nathan Straus, Mr. Abraham Elkus, and others who should be well informed, spoke in New York and elsewhere with deep feeling—indicated, for instance, by the assertion of Mr. Elkus that "the Dark Ages furnish the only parallel to the outrages which people of the Jewish faith have been subjected to recently in eastern Europe." Mr. Hughes said that protests should go up from all people, irrespective of race and in the name of humanity. A protest cabled to President Wilson by a council representing 200 Hebrew churches in 177 American cities says that it "is stirred to expressions of horror at the injustices and cruelties to which Jews in eastern Europe, notably in Poland, are being subjected. In lands where they have dwelt for generations, and for which they have made every sacrifice in blood and treasure throughout the war, they are still made victims of countless outrages."

But none of the speakers in New York or elsewhere, so far as we have noted, made anything more than generalized charges of massacre. A pamphlet issued by the Committee for Defense of Jews in Poland names a hundred and ten places where outrages against Jews were reported in two months; it gives many accounts of outrages and mass brutality, and asserts that the Polish Government has connived in the persecution of Jews. On the other hand, the Polish Information Bureau in New York City states that such reports of massacre have been contradicted by M. Pichon, the French Foreign Minister, and by Dr. Vernon Kellogg, who has been in Poland representing the United States Food Administration. Others deny the assertion that anything like a pogrom or massacre countenanced by the Polish Government or army has taken place.

The most definite statement we have seen made as to Jewish massacres in Poland relates to the city of Pinsk. The story is told at length by Mr. Elias Tobenkin in the New York "Tribune," and is based on information gathered by him in Poland, and interviews with people who claim to know the facts. There seems no doubt that over thirty Jews were summarily executed by military authority. Their friends and the Jewish papers in Poland declare that these persons executed were Zionists and members of co-operative societies who had met, not to conspire, but to help to arrange for the distribution of food from America. The military authorities, on the other hand, declare that the men executed were Bolsheviks and that they were dangerous spies and that when arrested by the soldiers they fired and killed an officer.

Mr. Smulski, President of the National Polish Department of America, has cabled to President Wilson declaring that the anti-Polish demonstrations in this country were unjustified, were doing injury to both Jews and Poles in creating antagonism, and should be checked.

POGROMS, WAR ANTAGONISM, OR RACE HATRED?

The word "pogrom" first became generally known in this country after the massacre at Kishinev in 1903, and was then and later used to mean an attack upon the Jews based partly on race hatred, but carried out by bloodthirsty mobs secretly encouraged or countenanced by the government. So far as we have seen, none of the charges relating to attacks by Poles on the Jews correspond to this description. Undoubtedly there has been rioting, and outrages have taken place, and the Jews have suffered in Poland and elsewhere. The attacks of this kind come in part from race hatred, but in part also because the Jews in Poland have been generally accused of aiding and sympathizing with Germany and with the Russian Bolsheviks whom the Poles have been fighting.

This view is expressed by an American who has special knowledge of the state of things in Poland. He tells The Outlook that "The situation in Poland is like the situation in our border States after the war; the antagonisms often leading to assaults and murders are based on war animosities rather than on religious or racial antagonisms; the Jews in Poland, speaking Yiddish, curried favor with the advancing Germans for self-protection; as they spoke Yiddish they were used by the Germans as interpreters and were paid in better protection and by more food than the Poles received themselves. It is not impossible to imagine that in some instances Jews betrayed Poles to their German conquerors. It is possible that the Poles are now attacking individual Jews, not for religious or even for racial reasons, but by way of revenge for what they believe to have been treasonable conduct on the part of these Jews during the war."

This American declares also that the Poles under Paderewski are making a more definite, decided, and persistent fight against Bolshevism than any other nation or people in eastern Europe. When public meetings in support of Bolshevism are discovered, they are warned to disperse, and if they gather again they are broken up by force. As a matter of fact, the majority of the supporters of Bolshevism in Poland are Jewish, just as they are in the United States. Whether this is from economic causes or from the racial sympathy which Jews of the less intelligent class have for their supposed co-religionists, Trotsky and Lenine, it is hard to say, but undoubtedly many of the clashes between the Polish authorities and Jews can be traced to the Jewish sympathy with Bolshevism.

A Polish officer, Lieutenant de Walski, has said in an interview that "the real answer to the slanderous stories of Jewish pogroms can be had from Jewish officers in the Polish army." He paid a warm tribute to them and to the Jewish soldiers who "are making gallant sacrifices for the creation of a real united and independent Poland," and added: "While those men in the battlefield are cementing the foundations of the relations between the Jewish and Polish people in Poland, these men in America are doing their best to disrupt them."

THE CALAMITY IN JAVA

The destruction wrought by the eruption of the volcano of Kalut in Java is only indicated in bare outline by the despatches. If it is true, as estimated, that the eruption has caused fifteen thousand deaths and has destroyed twenty villages, this will rank with one of the great volcanic disasters of history.

Java is important as one of the most fertile and productive of the Dutch East Indies. The people in many parts of the island, however, live in constant fear of such destruction as has lately occurred. The volcano of Kalut is only one, it is said, of fourteen active volcanoes on the island. The most terrible of all modern volcanic disasters was that of Krakatoa in the year 1883. Krakatoa is not a part of Java itself, the volcano and island of that name lie in Sunda Strait between Java and Sumatra. In this eruption of Krakatoa not only was the destruction of life and property almost incalculable, but the sky was darkened by the dust and ashes which arose, so that it was like night one hundred and fifty or more miles away from the scene of the explosion; even half-way around the world or more the effects of the volcanic dust on the light were weirdly evident, and ashes from the explosion fell upon ships and cities hundreds of miles away from Java.

Such a disaster happening on the other side of the world makes less impression on the imagination and on sympathy than if it were caused by an eruption from Ætna or Vesuvius. When the facts come to be known definitely, however, it is certain that the assistance and sympathy of humanity will be rendered to these poor and remote sufferers.

THE CHURCH AND SOCIAL RECONSTRUCTION

The bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church have issued a Pastoral Letter to the eighteen thousand pastors of that Church on "The Church and Social Reconstruction." They urge that the Church must recognize the application of democracy to industry, and they call for "the more thoroughgoing emphasis on human freedom, which will make democratic progress mean the enlargement and enrichment of the life of the masses of mankind through the self-directed activity of men themselves." They favor an equitable wage for laborers, which shall have the right of way over "rent, interest, and profits;" "collective bargaining as an instrument for the attainment of industrial justice and for training in democratic procedure;" and also the "advance of the workers themselves through profit-sharing and through positions on boards of directorship."

We should like to see the pastors of the Methodist churches read this admirable pastoral letter to their congregations and make it their text for one or more discourses on the application of the fundamental principles of democracy to modern industrial institutions, or, what would be better, the application of the principles and spirit of Christ's teachings to modern industry. We venture to suggest three possible texts for such discourses: Matthew xx. 7, "Whatsoever is right, that shall ye receive;" Matthew xxiii. 8, "All ye are brethren;" and Ephesians vi. 7, 9, "With good will doing service as to the Lord and not to men; . . . and ye masters do the same things." We also wish that the bishops could prepare a primer on Christian Socialism, or find among the various books which have been published on this subject one which they could recommend to the ministers for the purpose of giving to them in brief and simple form some of the fundamental principles which the pulpit must recognize if it is to deal intelligently with the application of Christian principles in social and industrial reform.

A GREAT EDUCATIONAL SCHEME

The incidental and indirect work of foreign missions may perhaps prove to be of both wider and more permanent value than their direct evangelistic work. A striking illustration of the new spirit of foreign missions is furnished by the fact that the Chinese Government has recently adopted a new Chinese phonetic alphabet at the request of the Mission Boards, and this alphabet is now being pushed by missionary schools throughout China. It takes the place of the old system, which employed between fifty and sixty thousand characters of complex design, making facility in reading almost a life task. The new system has thirty-nine simple characters, which, singly or in combination, represent every sound in the Mandarin dialect, which has been designated as the national language. Few words will have more than three letters.

Some experimental tests with patients in hospitals have proved that in this new script an ignorant Chinese peasant can be taught to read his language in from three to four weeks, and a scholar can be taught in from three to four hours. In these facts the advocates of the new spelling might perhaps find an argument for their proposed reform.

The plan of the Mission Boards is first to teach every Christian to read in the new style. With seven hundred thousand persons, working from seven thousand different centers, as a teaching force for the population at large, making the Chinese people a reading people is not an impossible undertaking. The first literature will not be religious in character, but patriotic, the idea being to teach the Chinese the meaning of democracy and the duties of citizenship. The ultimate object is nothing less than the education of four hundred million Chinese people.

TO FIGHT DISEASE AND DESTITUTION

An account was lately given in The Outlook of the new League of Red Cross Societies which will work internationally to combat hunger, destitution, and disease. The great Red Cross International Congress to be held at Geneva after the Peace Treaty is signed will doubtless indorse the League. Mr. Henry P. Davison, head of the Red Cross War Council until recently, and now head of the League, put its purpose tersely when talking to reporters the other day just after his return from Europe. He said:

In former times the Red Cross was an organization for war, to mitigate the horrors of war and to relieve victims of disasters. We now propose to make it the greatest of all peace organizations through an international bond which I hope will eventually take in all of the nations of the globe.

With no political or governmental or sectarian connections whatever, the League purposes, in this international compact, to work for the betterment of humanity by distributing the knowledge contributed to it and by stirring local agencies to keen activity. Knowing, let us say, that a pestilence is about to afflict any part of the world, just as it was known that the Spanish influenza was advancing, the League will warn the threatened territories, offer the best preventive and curative methods, advise the local Red Cross organizations what to do and generally inspire the proper agencies to a correct and efficient handling of the problem.

The disease danger is threatening Europe terribly to-day. Mr. Davison received, before sailing, a report of two hundred and seventy-five thousand cases of typhus in a belt from the Baltic to the Black Sea, "a wave of disease moving westward." He spoke with startling emphasis of "the incredible, the unbelievable, distress that exists in the world to-day," and declared that the right kind of Americans could not sleep if they knew the misery of Europe in its savage reality. It is well that such a warning from those who know the facts at first hand should show us that the need of relief and succor is far from being a thing of the past. Through the Red Cross League and in other ways the fight to make Europe clean, healthy, and sound must go on both for humanity's sake and ultimately for self-protection against the results of plague and poverty.

THE CHILDREN'S BUREAU CONFERENCE ON CHILD WELFARE STANDARDS

The standards below which a nation cannot afford to let its children fall were the subject of the conference on child welfare held in Washington early in May. The purpose of the conference was to set up new standards for the health, education, and work of the American child. Foreign child-welfare experts were invited to attend and relate to the American specialists in child welfare how their respective countries had raised and maintained their standards of child care even under the strain of war. Committees were appointed in each section—one on standards for education and work, others on the baby, the pre-school child, the school child, the adolescent, and one on the child in need of special care.

The Washington conference set sixteen as the lowest age at which children should go to work in any occupation while school is in session. It proposed as the minimum educational standard nine months' schooling, either full or part time, for children between seven and eighteen. It declared that a child of sixteen should not go to work unless he has completed the eighth grade in school, and that education beyond the eighth grade should be provided for employed children between sixteen and eighteen years by day continuation schools.

According to the conference, the working day of minors should never be longer than eight hours, and for children between sixteen and eighteen should be less than the adult's working day; night work and employment in hazardous occupations should be prohibited; minors should be paid at a rate which, for full-time employment, would yield at least the "necessary cost of proper living."

The importance of normal home care for defective, dependent, and delinquent children was emphasized. The need of State supervision of agencies and institutions caring for children for whom home life could not be provided was urged; the principles governing modern juvenile court organization were set forth in detail.

The outstanding point of the discussion at the Washington conference was that without a decent wage earned by the father of the family complete protection of childhood is impossible. Professor Kelly Miller, dean of the college of arts and sciences at Howard University, said: "The cure of poverty may not end social troubles, but they cannot be abolished until poverty is abolished."

THE FARMER'S BOY AND THE SCHOOL

Great Britain sent Sir Cyril Jackson, a member of her new industrial commission who had been deeply concerned in the passage of the new Fisher Education Act, to explain to the Children's Bureau Conference the provisions of this new British law. It was passed last August, because the drain of war had brought home the conviction that the children of Great Britain must not be exploited in industry or on the farm, but must one and all, in city and country alike, be given their chance of schooling.

Miss Julia C. Lathrop, Chief of the Children's Bureau, in the discussion following Sir Cyril Jackson's exposition of the Act, expressed her belief that a measure similar to the Fisher Act is needed in the United States. Miss Lathrop pointed out that the United States has never attacked the problem of rural child labor and the lack of schooling which goes with it. Yet approximately three-fourths of all the child laborers in the United States work in rural districts where one person out of every ten is illiterate, while in the cities one person in twenty is unable to read and write.

The Fisher Act, by requiring the attendance at school of every child until he is fourteen years old, regardless of where he happens to live, has brought it about that the farmer's boy and the textile worker's son have equal chance in Great Britain to fit themselves for life. Equality of opportunity like that which Great Britain has provided for her children could be provided in this country, Miss Lathrop pointed out, if the Federal Government were empowered to grant Federal aid for education to States which come up to certain uniform educational requirements, to be set forth by the Federal Government. In this way the States could square the account which the country boy has against them for his present smaller chance of schooling, and the stimulus of Federal aid would give new incentive to the States to better their educational standards. "I have seen in one country in this world, under the American flag," said Miss Lathrop, "schools so managed that the children clamored to go to them. Must we wait for some superior race to come from Mars to give us the same gift of interesting schools that we have bestowed upon the Philippines?"

WAR MEMORIALS

AMONG the greatest monuments of all time are memorials to war. Some of them recount the conquests of tyrants. Others recount the achievements of free men. War seems to have left in all epochs of history its record in art.

This will inevitably be true of the war which is scarcely yet ended. Already the instinct to set up memorials to men and deeds of this war is showing itself in America. Already memorials, some of them temporary, have been erected. Already discussion of the nature of those memorials is taking place. Recently at the Tenth Annual Convention of the American Federation of Arts, which was held at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York City, a day was devoted to this subject of war memorials.

This is not a matter to be put aside as secondary. By the memorials that we erect to-day future generations will judge this epoch. Those memorials will not merely tell what happened in the war, but they will also tell what war did to the minds and souls of the people who went through it and survived it.

All over the country there are to-day memorials to the Civil War. If most of them endure, men a hundred or two hundred years hence will have good cause to misjudge the minds and souls of the people who lived in the four or five decades succeeding 1865. They will get little impression of the profound change that came over America through that war. They will see only ugly brown images of unsoldierlike se-diers, set up with little evidence of a sense of dignity. The real veneration in which the veterans of that war have been held in both the North and the South is not embodied in the Civil War monuments that dot this land. We owe it to our posterity that we of this day do not misrepresent ourselves in like fashion.

For that reason several speakers at the meeting of the American Federation of Arts urged that the building of war memorials be postponed. They argued that we are too near the event to understand it, and that, moreover, even if we understood it fully, we are too near to the event to put our thought of it into a form that would be understood of future ages. We must take time to think, to form our thoughts, and to choose for the forms of our thought material that will be enduring. It was remarked that the greatest monument to Washington, that noble and severe shaft at the country's capital, was not erected for three generations after Washington's day; that we could likewise afford to wait and to build our monuments at leisure.

There was also some lively discussion as to the nature of such monuments. Should they be useful as well as beautiful? Or should all effort toward utility be excluded as out of place in artistic monuments to the ideals associated with this war? Some argued that there was no better way to honor the men who had fallen in the war than to build houses which would serve the needs of living men. Others argued that a monument embodying an ideal should have no other function than to speak, as it were, to the people who looked upon it. Some would build parks or highways or community houses which would serve the needs of the people for recreation or transportation or fellowship. Others would avoid everything that did not convey solely the idea of a memorial.

It is inevitable that there should be such differences of opinion, such argument, and the delay consequent upon the process of reconciling differences of opinion, reaching compromises, or building up a composite of opinion.

It is well, perhaps, that there should be such delay in erecting the greater monuments of the war, but the people will not wait indefinitely. The craving for a visible memorial cannot be satisfied with a promise or a hope. The communities whose sons went to the camps or across the seas, some of them never to return, are not waiting for the decisions of some art authority or for the outcome of a grand public discussion. They are erecting their monuments to-day.

Two or three weeks ago, on the side of a mountain where a few dwellings are scattered, there was gathered by the roadside on a Sunday afternoon a group of perhaps forty or fifty people. They were representatives of the families of the men and the women who had gone from that mountain into the service of their country. They were there to dedicate a monument. It was a simple flag-pole. And after the few words by neighbors of the men who had gone, an old veteran of the Civil War slowly hauled the Stars and Stripes to the top of the staff. Those people were not waiting for an art authority to tell them what to do; they instinctively chose of themselves a fitting memorial—one of which future generations will not be ashamed. That simple staff, with the flag floating above the tree-tops, is a memorial both suitable in itself and capable of future development in base and surroundings. The flag, moreover, is a universal testimonial to a people's patriotism and embodies the ideal that appears in every war of the Nation. In other communities trees have been planted. These too are appropriate for the purposes of immediate recognition of the service that has been rendered.

We hope that the building of great monuments will be postponed until men have time to collect their thoughts and embody them in fitting form; but we also hope that communities all over the country will not hesitate to put up such memorials at once as those flagstaves, with the Stars and Stripes and the service flags, or the trees, with their simple tablets recording the names of the men whose memory it is their function to keep green.

If those who have authority, because they have trained and informed taste, in art will recognize the need that people feel for immediate recognition of the achievements of their sons and daughters, of their brothers and sisters, in this war, the people in their turn will be the readier to trust the guidance of those experts when the time comes for the erection of great and lasting monuments.

AMERICA AND RUSSIA— A CONTRAST

READERS of Mr. Price's article in this issue of The Outlook will note what he says about the progress of Socialism in this country. And then when they turn to Dr. Carasso's article they will note what the Bolshevik brand of Socialism has done to Russia. There may be some readers who will consequently wonder if we are on our way here in the United States to the goal set up by Lenine and Trotsky.

There are dangers ahead in this country, but not that particular danger.

Whatever fear there may be of that danger arises from the ambiguity that lies in the very word Socialism. There are Socialists, or at least people who call themselves Socialists, who would undoubtedly deny that either what Mr. Price describes or what the Bolsheviks practice is Socialism. The word Socialism covers a multitude both of sins and of virtues. It can be legitimately used for any plan or practice in accordance with which wealth is produced or distributed by large social units. More strictly, Socialism is the theory that wealth which can be produced and distributed by large social units should be and ultimately will be. The term Socialistic is commonly applied to any means which any Socialists would employ for putting their theory into practice. Thus it happens that things so diverse as the United States Post Office and a local soviet in Russia may both be termed Socialistic.

The Socialism that Mr. Price discusses and the Socialism which the Bolsheviks are practicing are as wide as the poles apart.

BRAND WHITLOCK'S "BELGIUM"

PROFESSOR KUNO FRANCKE, of Harvard, said before the war that the German's supreme desire is not for self-possession but for self-expression. Brand Whitlock had an opportunity which no other American possessed for studying the German character where the Germans, as absolute masters of a conquered and subject people, had unrestrained freedom for self-expression. Neither Mr. Herrick nor Mr. Sharp was in France during the whole period of the war, and neither of them was in devastated France, and neither Italy nor England was at any time subject to German rule. Mr. Whitlock was in Brussels as our representative from before the outbreak of the war in August, 1914, until America entered the war in April, 1917, and during all that time he was in constant communication with the German authorities, both civil and military, as the representative of French, German, and English as well as of American interests, and constantly engaged in a not wholly fruitless endeavor to mitigate the awful sufferings, mental and physical, of a proud and sensitive people.

He had special advantages for his difficult post and special advantages for describing to others the difficulties which he encountered. Elected for four successive terms reform Mayor of Toledo, he had ever before him a practicable standard of just government for a free city with which to compare the German government of a subjugated people. He knew the complicated problems involved in municipal government and knew how they could be met by a righteous and humane administration. He had experience as a journalist in catching fleeting news, in weighing evidence, and in discriminating between history and gossip; and he had experience as a successful writer of books in transforming journalism into literature. He had also native qualifications for the task he has here undertaken, that of giving a vivid description of the scenes through which he passed. He has a quick and keen observation; his mind is a sensitive plate which catches the picture however rapidly it passes. He has a retentive memory. The minute details remain upon the plate and are accurately reproduced in the printing, months afterwards. He writes:

I had asked an audience of the Queen for Miss Boyle O'Reilly, who had a message of sympathy from America. . . . Presently the Queen entered. She wore a simple blue gown with transparent sleeves, and a white, low girlish collar; not a jewel, only her wedding ring on her hand, and her hair dressed in delicate simplicity. She was calm, with a certain gravity, and her blue eyes were wistful in the little smile that hovered about her lips.

This minuteness of observation and vividness of description characterize the two volumes throughout. They are full of character and incident, and to the value of an original contribution to current history is added the charm of a realistic imagination. No less appealing is the tempered sympathy of this well-regulated but not phlegmatic American with the constantly changing experiences of the emotional and witty Belgians—sympathy with them not only in the terrible, the unbelievable tragedies almost daily enacted, but also in the ingenious reactions of the ever-alert Belgians, in the "contest between German stolidity and brute force and the nimble wit of Brussels." The German authorities forbade by proclamation the Belgians from celebrating their national holiday, July 21—no meetings, no processions, no flags, no ribbons or patriotic colors—a prohibition to which Brussels wit responded by substituting a new emblem, the ivy leaf; and "suddenly, as by some spontaneous impulse, the whole population was wearing ivy leaves, the symbol of fidelity, of which the motto is 'I die where I cling.'" August 4 was the anniversary of the beginning of the war. To assemble, to wear insignia, to make demonstrations or in any way to observe the day, was forbidden. And there was a penalty for disobedience—five years in Germany and ten thousand marks fine.

The fourth of August passed quietly, but the Belgians had their revenge—all over the city men were wearing as boutonnières little scraps of paper, recalling the famous phrase by which von Beth-mann Hollweg had characterized the treaties that he had torn up that day a year before.

But we should wholly misrepresent Mr. Whitlock's two volumes if we gave the impression that they are simply a journalist's vivid description of incidents, occasionally amusing, generally somber, often terribly tragic. His work is a valuable contribution both to the history of our times and to the psychology of the German people. He describes the German policy of terrorism without palliation, generally without passion, though occasionally flaming words break out showing the fires of indignation within, kept under control only with extreme difficulty. In the main he depicts what he has seen. When he acts as a narrator of the reports of others, he gives the evidence on which his narrative is based. An important and valuable feature of his history are the original documents given in the original, sometimes with, sometimes without, translation. His account of the murder of Edith Cavell is authoritative because founded on his own personal knowledge, supplemented by official reports. He was not present at the assassination of Louvain, but his narrative is founded on first-hand information, and his analysis of the German defense of that unparalleled act of barbarism would do credit to the cross-examining skill of an experienced district attorney. He preserved throughout his stay in Brussels an official neutrality, involving a self-restraint under indignity worthy of all praise, a self-restraint which enabled him to render valuable service in a number of instances. But he was never neutral in thought, and we read between the lines that neutrality in act was preserved at times with difficulty. As with his contemporary, Dr. van Dyke, in Holland, the causes of the war were to him never obscure and its meaning never doubtful. His definition of that meaning is worth quoting. He writes it after Germany had told America by what route her ships might cross the Atlantic, but it is quite clear that he perceived the meaning in August, 1914:

I was perfectly certain of the answer: it would be war, inevitable from that moment in August, 1914, when the two old systems clashed once more in a world that, by the many inventions which man, originally made upright, had wickedly sought out, had grown too small for both to live in it any longer together. It had been inevitable from the moment when the war brought face to face at last two civilizations, two ideals, two faiths—on the one hand the ideal of liberty and human justice, on the other that of brute force and material success.

It is impossible not to regret that Brand Whitlock was not one of America's representatives at the Peace Table. It would have been well to have had there an American who had seen the Hun at his work, the more so since the President could not find or make the time to visit the devastated regions and see what destruction the Hun had wrought. It is not the duty of man to execute vindictive justice on his fellow-man. We have neither the moral nor the intellectual ability for that task. It must be left to God. If, then, any ask, Why need we read the history of Germany's cruel crime now that it is past history? the answer is, Lest we forget. For if there is anything in the ideal of a League of Nations, if there is any duty of civilized peoples to protect one another from a horde more barbarous in war than ever were the North American Indians and scarcely less barbarous than were the ancient Assyrians, we must know what sort of people these modern Huns are, that we may prevent them from repeating the crime which they are apparently quite ready to repeat if they are allowed to acquire the necessary power.

FIFTY YEARS OF RELIGIOUS TOLERATION IN SPAIN

SPANISH Protestantism early in May celebrated the fifty years of religious toleration by holding a Congress of Religion in Madrid. Representatives of sister churches in France and Great Britain were present, and the Rev. Charles William Drees, Methodist Episcopal missionary from eastern South America, went as a representative of American Protestantism. Dr. Drees was a member of the Bible translation committee which a few years ago prepared the translation of the Spanish Bible now in use among the Protestants. Religious toleration was actually granted by the Constitution of 1868, but the celebration was postponed from last fall until this spring because of the difficulties of travel for invited guests from abroad.

In 1868, when toleration became partially effective, Protestantism had practically disappeared from Spain. There were only a few families who had been able to possess their faith in secret. These were at once reinforced by religious refugees who returned from Gibraltar and from France. The British Bible Society and the Religious Tract Society immediately began work. In 1872 the American Board sent out the Gulick brothers, and about the same time Protestant preachers came from England, Scotland, and the north of Ireland. The Germans were represented by Pastor Fliedner, and from various other Continental sources funds were contributed for the assistance of the new faith.

It is very difficult to determine the exact numerical advance which Protestantism has made in the half-century. Actual Protestant membership in organized churches is probably less than five thousand, although some places give the number of Protestants, including those who belong to unorganized groups of worshipers in places where churches have not been established, at from fifteen to twenty thousand. The Protestant adherents are variously estimated at from one hundred thousand to a million. There are about one hundred and fifty regularly organized congregations.

Religious liberty does not exist in Spain, and even toleration is only partially extended. Within the last ten years Protestants have been given permission to use distinctively ecclesiastical symbols on the outside of their church buildings, but a Protestant soldier is still compelled to join in the Catholic military worship on festival days. It is required of all, Protestants and Catholics alike, that they shall kneel in the street whenever a religious procession passes in which the Host is carried. Not long ago a Protestant minister was sentenced to six months in jail for refusal to obey this law, but the case was appealed and the sentence set aside.

The degree of religious toleration varies with the locality, diminishing in the more remote districts where the priest and the monastics are still able to control the officials.

It seems to be generally agreed that the Church has ceased to be an active factor in the direction of the Government, but yet, while the demand for the disestablishment of the Church is not very vigorous, there is a very general demand for the granting of complete religious freedom. In this desire the Protestants are joined by the Socialists, Syndicalists, and by all the liberal forces which are now very rapidly increasing in strength. There is great disappointment in Spain over the failure to include religious freedom in the constitution of the League of Nations. It was expected that the inclusion of this qualification for membership would force Spain to make the necessary changes in her Constitution, for Spain is a proud country and would not wish to be excluded from the League. There is still a possibility that Spain may have to revise her Constitution in order to qualify for membership, for Spain is a "free nation" only in the sense that the King is free to dissolve the Cortes as suits his pleasure and declare war when he sees fit. If Spain is thus forced to call a constitutional convention, there is no doubt that full religious liberty will be established. On the other hand, if Spain does not soon call a convention for the revision of her mediæval Constitution, it is equally certain that the liberal elements will take matters into their own hands.

One interesting feature of the religious situation, studied in the light of the very disturbed political and economic conditions, is that Protestantism is closely identified with the liberal movement. There is, of course, no organic connection. Indeed, the liberal movement in Spain is merely a miscellaneous collection of local political and economic movements which have not at all coalesced, a fact which accounts for their present doubtful strength. But public sentiment is undoubtedly changing front, and Protestantism is both a factor and a sharer in the advantages.

During the last year the sale of the Bible through the British Bible Society has increased nearly thirty per cent. This is ascribed to the influence of the war and to the advertisements which have been carried in the Spanish newspapers, giving the statements of what famous men have said about the Bible. Prominent in these advertisements have been the words of President Wilson written for the fly-leaf of the soldiers' Bibles.

All Spanish Protestant churches are joined in a loose organization known as the Spanish Evangelical Alliance, the primary function of which is to furnish legal assistance to individual believers who have been drawn into the law courts for failure to observe laws affecting religious liberty upon which the Roman Catholic Church is still disposed to insist. Within this Alliance are two groups of Protestants, the Spanish Reformed Church and the Spanish Evangelical Churches. The former is an effort to adapt Protestantism to the taste of those who have been reared under the sensuous appeal of the Catholic liturgy and who still respond to its æsthetic charm and symbolism. The liturgy was adapted from the English Prayer-Book. The great bulk of Spanish Protestants are joined in the mission churches of the various Protestant bodies: American Congregationalists, German Lutherans, Scotch and Irish Presbyterians, Plymouth Brethren, and British Wesleyans. The American Methodist Episcopal Church has recently taken over, as a part of its new European programme, some strong independent schools and missions which were formerly conducted by independent missionaries who had depended largely on the uncertain support of voluntary contributions from individual English and Continental friends.

Spanish Protestantism can claim only three schools for higher education—an American Board Girls' School in Barcelona of unusual excellence, a German Lutheran College in Madrid, and a Scotch theological seminary in Porto de la Santa Maria.

The effect of the war on Spanish religion has been distinctly liberalizing. The pro-German activity of the Spanish Catholic clergy was costly in view of the Allied victory, whereas the Spanish people have been drinking deep draughts from the liberal ideas which furnished the slogans under which the Allied nations fought.

UNION OR CO-OPERATION

THERE is much encouraging discussion in these days concerning means by which the various denominations of the Christian Church can either unite or co-operate.

Practically all the various ways may be divided into three classes according to the object in view.

One of these objects may be designated by the word union; the second object by the words undenominational co-operation; the third by the words church co-operation.

The ideal under the first object is a united Church, comprising a single organization under common direction.

Such unity existed throughout a great part of Christendom before the ancient schism between the Eastern and the Western churches and throughout a large part of Europe before the Protestant Reformation. There are people to-day who are seeking for a restoration of that sort of Church unity.

The ideal under the second object has been very largely attained among Protestant denominations by the growth of the Young Men's Christian Association, the Young Women's Christian Association, and kindred organizations. By these means the various denominations, though not united organically nor co-operating as denominations, are engaged through their individual members in employing a common agency. The Y. M. C. A. does not represent a united church or even co-operating churches, but a common instrument of the various churches for a definite purpose.

The ideal under the third head has been sought through various forms of federation leaving unchanged the present liberty of the Protestant churches in creed and ritual.

Among the most ambitious plans for organic Church unity is that which we have heretofore reported, undertaken by a group of Episcopal Church leaders, to secure the co-operation of Roman Catholic, Greek, Orthodox, and Protestant churches. In March a deputation consisting of Bishop Anderson, of Chicago, Bishop Vincent, of Southern Ohio, and Bishop Weller, of the Diocese of Fond du Lac, Wisconsin, accompanied by two Episcopal clergymen, the Rev. S. T. Rogers and the Rev. E. L. Parsons, left America to secure the co-operation of the Vatican in this Conference, as well as to visit certain other Church authorities in Europe. Our statement concerning the nature and purpose of this deputation, which we gave in the issue of April 2, and again in reply to a letter from Bishop Brewster, of Connecticut, in the issue of April 16, has been questioned by Dr. John T. Shelby, Chancellor of the Diocese of Lexington. He declares that the mission in question "was no more one from the Episcopal Church than it was from all the churches, Episcopal and non-Episcopal, participating in the movement for the proposed conference between Christians generally on matters of Faith and Order;" and he further asserts that it was "no more a mission to Rome than it was to any of the other Christian communions whom it expects to visit and request participation in the movement." He declares furthermore that it did not sail for Rome to make an attempt to open negotiations with the Vatican, but "for the purpose of extending to the constituted authorities of a large and most influential Christian communion a courteous invitation to meet with what, if I am not mistaken, it has frequently denominated its 'separated brethren' in a brotherly conference to ascertain which of the matters which separate them are of the essence of the faith or of the valid constitution of a Christian church, and therefore cannot be surrendered, and which are not."

Dr. Shelby furthermore writes to correct what he thinks will be the impression conveyed by another statement in The Outlook. This referred to another effort for Church co-operation. Representatives of certain Protestant Churches proposed a union of all Protestant Churches during the war for a definite and temporary purpose—that of securing common action in the special consecration of army chaplains, that they might be able to administer the sacrament of the Lord's Supper unquestioned to sailors and soldiers on the battlefield, so that communicants of the Episcopal Church might receive the sacrament under circumstances which would be satisfactory to them when an Episcopal clergyman could not be had. The Outlook spoke of this as a proposal made to the authorities of the Episcopal Church, and reported that the Bishops refused it so curtly that the Episcopal journal, the "Churchman," called them sharply to account for their discourtesy. Dr. Shelby writes saying that in this matter the Bishops of the Church as a body have no separate authority. "In the Episcopal Church the matter of conferring authority to exercise the functions of a presbyter, or, as some might prefer to say, a priest," explains Dr. Shelby, "is one regulated exclusively by the general canons of the Church. As The Outlook must know, the power of legislation in that Church is lodged in its General Convention, a body which meets every three years and is composed of two separate houses, viz., the House of Bishops and the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies, concurrent action of both of which is necessary to the enactment of legislation. The House of Bishops by itself has no more authority than have the editors of The Outlook to change the existing canons of the Church as to the requisites for ordination to the ministry or than has the United States Senate by itself to change a law of the United States."

We quote these statements from Dr. Shelby's letter, although we think that the facts he mentions have already been given to our readers in our previous treatment of the subject, because we wish not only to report accurately the facts as we see them, but also to reflect the view of those facts taken by some churchmen in the Episcopal Church. The fact remains that the bishops, in answer to the communication from the representatives of various Protestant denominations, did not decline because of their lack of jurisdiction, but turned the request down. Though the House of Bishops did not have authority to adopt the proposal, they did have the authority, and exercised the authority, of rejecting it; for without their approval the proposal could not be adopted.

As for the mission to Rome; whether it can be said to represent other churches than the Episcopal Church, it is composed exclusively of Episcopalians, and it did lay the proposal to attend an interchurch conference before the Vatican. In our editorial comment of April 2 we recalled the declaration of Leo XIII to the effect that the Pope cannot recognize the Episcopal claim to Apostolic succession, that Episcopal orders are invalid, and that Anglicans can have recognition by Rome only by returning to the bosom of the Mother Church, and we added: "It is probable that the Vatican will receive the advances of the Episcopal bishops more courteously than the Episcopal bishops received the advances of the Protestant clergy, for the Vatican is sure to be diplomatic. But it is as certain as anything in the future can be that the Vatican will not recognize the Episcopal Church as a Christian Church nor its clergy as Christian priests, nor enter into any official relations with that Church or its clergy."

Pope Benedict XV received the visiting deputation of Episcopal prelates on May 16, was most cordial to them, and thanked them for their call; but the Pontiff explained to the visiting clergymen that the Catholic Church could not take part in the proposed conference; that as "successor to St. Peter, the Vicar of Christ has no greater desire than that there should be but one fold and one shepherd;" but that the teaching of the Roman Catholic Church concerning Church unity was well known, and therefore "it would not be possible for the Catholic Church to participate in the proposed conference." He added most graciously that he hoped that those who were to take part in the conference "may by the grace of God see the light and reunite with the visible head of the Church, by whom they will be received with open arms." Cardinal Gasparri, Papal Secretary of State, also explained in a talk to the American Episcopal bishops that "rather than a reunion of the Christian churches the Holy See aims at the unity of the Church, which, in the opinion of Rome, can only occur by all returning to the Catholic Church."

We are not disappointed at this outcome of the visit of this Episcopal mission to Rome, for we have seen no ground for expectation that any other result would ensue. And we repeat what we said on April 2, that "the only hope of Christian union in this country is in a federation of the free Christian churches, co-operating on terms of mutual respect in Christian activity."

A movement not so much in the direction of organic Christian unity as in the direction of co-operation has been under way in the Episcopal Church. It is one of the most interesting symptoms of aspiration toward co-operation. It consists in the proposal, in which some High Churchmen in the Episcopal Church and some Congregational clergymen have united in suggesting to the Episcopal Church a new canon which would allow Episcopal ordination to men not intending to become Episcopal clergymen, so that they could officiate in Episcopal churches on a basis of equality with Episcopal clergymen.

On the invitation of the editor of The New York Churchman, who is making a very lively and readable, and therefore effective, paper out of that old-established journal, Dr. Lyman Abbott, the Editor-in-Chief of The Outlook, gave in the "Churchman" for May 17 his reasons for believing that there is nothing in Anglo-Catholic principles to prevent a free exchange of pulpits between Episcopal clergymen and the clergymen of other denominations. This letter follows:

To the Editor of The Churchman:

I gladly take advantage of your permission to put before your readers the reason why I think that there is nothing in the principles of the Anglo-Catholic to prevent him from inviting a non-episcopally ordained minister into his pulpit to preach to his congregation. He cannot consistently invite such a minister to administer the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, because that the Anglo-Catholic regards as a priestly function, and the non-episcopally ordained minister is not a priest. But preaching is not a priestly function, and has never been so regarded by the Catholic Church.

The religious worship of the ancient Hebrews was sacrificial. Only an ordained priest could officiate in the conduct of this sacrificial worship. For an unordained person to officiate at the altar was sacrilege. But religious education was furnished, not by priests, but by prophets. And the prophets were not priests; they were not ordained; they belonged to no order. Any one who believed that he had a message might deliver it at any time, on any day, in any place. The only condition required was loyalty. Jehovah was the accepted King of Israel. No one could preach disloyalty to the King, because that was treason, and treason has been in all countries, in all nations, and in all eras forbidden by law and punishable, generally by death.

Whether the sacrificial service and the priesthood were taken over from Judaism to Christianity is a debatable question which I do not here consider; but there is no question that preaching was taken over from Judaism to Christianity. And there is no question that preaching was no more a priestly act or confined to a priestly order in the primitive Apostolic Church than in the Jewish Church. Jesus Christ was not a priest. Not one of the Twelve Apostles was a priest. The disciples, we are told, when they were scattered abroad by persecution, "went everywhere preaching the word." Stephen, the first martyr, was not a priest. Philip, the evangelist, was not a priest. Paul, who claimed to be an apostle and was the most notable preacher of his time, was not a priest. And one of the very last directions in the Bible is a call to all disciples of Jesus Christ to give the message of Christ's Gospel. "The Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come."

At what time in the Catholic Church the privilege of the laity to preach the glad tidings was first questioned I do not know, but until well on in the Middle Ages it was not usual for monks and friars to be priests; and in the thirteenth century the work of the preaching friars in England was one of the most notable influences in awakening the consciences of an uninstructed people to whom the priests had apparently given very little instruction. This work of the friars was done, Green tells us in his "History of the English People," "by an utter reversal of the older monasticism, by seeking personal salvation in effort for the salvation of their fellow-men, by exchanging the solitary of the cloister for the preacher, the monk for the brother or friar." They were not only not priests, but they were bitterly opposed by the priests. "The welcome of the townsmen made up everywhere for the ill will and opposition of both clergy and monks."

The Catholic priest and the Protestant minister agree that the Protestant minister is not a priest. The Protestant minister therefore has no reason to complain that the Catholic priest does not invite him to perform what the Catholic priest regards as exclusively priestly functions. But preaching is not and has never been regarded as a priestly function. Ordination is not and never has been regarded as a necessary prerequisite to preaching. If the Anglo-Catholic asks me, Why, then, do Protestants ordain their ministers? I reply, Certainly not because they think that ordination confers on them the right to preach. They welcome Dwight L. Moody and Billy Sunday into their pulpits, and neither Dwight L. Moody nor Billy Sunday has ever been ordained. Probably most Protestants would agree that Protestant ordination confers no new spiritual power on the minister; it is simply a solemn and formal acceptance of him after careful inquiry respecting his abilities and character as a person intellectually and spiritually fitted to be a religious teacher of the people.

If both Anglo-Catholic and Protestant ministers would frankly recognize this age-long distinction between the priestly and the prophetic function, and Anglo-Catholic priests would invite Protestant ministers into their pulpits, and Protestant ministers would appreciate the fact that the Anglo-Catholic priest regards the Eucharist as a priestly function and therefore cannot consistently invite the Protestant minister to officiate at the altar, a long step would be taken toward better relations between the two, and therefore toward Christian, if not church, unity. It would be a long step because it would be founded on mutual respect for each other's sacred convictions, and would make clear to the general public what is the real union and what is the real difference between the Anglo-Catholic priest and the Protestant minister.

New York City.

LYMAN ABBOTT.

These discussions and movements, however they may result temporarily, are leading the minds of men in the direction of some kind of Church unity. Such unity must have as its basis a unity of the spirit. The recent gathering at Cleveland, Ohio, where various Church organizations, including the Episcopal, Methodist, Congregational, Presbyterian, and others, is an indication of the direction in which real Church unity is to be sought. It is significant that those gathered at Cleveland were not primarily the representatives of ecclesiastical form but of religious activity, for they were the representatives chiefly of missionary boards. In the war, unity of command came when it was found that men should fight together. In the Church, unity will come when men will learn to work together.

STURGIS AND EUNICE

BY LADD PLUMLEY

TROUT fishermen know that when you get way back in the mountains, where villages and farms are far apart, you are fairly certain of getting good fishing; and by a simple method a fellow-lover of fly fishing once selected a stream for our attention during the coming trout season. As we did not wish to go far from New York, he chose the Catskill region, and on a county map he picked out the merest dot of a village, which was more remote from a railway than any of the other dots and which was at the upper end of a waving line that meant a river. He wrote to the postmaster of the dot, and, as we found later, my friend had selected a secluded little valley, where we enjoyed excellent sport.

I think that one of the interesting things concerning fishing in remote regions is that you come to know folks far more intimately than you can ever know people in cities. And after a few seasons of fishing along a mountain creek, and hobnobbing with the mountaineers at the streamside, all sorts of gossip will float to your ears; that is, if you are considered safe for such confidences—and mountain folk are pretty shrewd in their knowledge of human nature.

At lunching time one day of the first season we enjoyed our "Secluded Valley," as we named the mountain interval, I wanted a glass of milk. Above a grassy slope, near the stream, stood a pretty cottage. Knowing all that I had to do to obtain milk was to ask for it, I passed around the house, where were roses at the side of the path and a well-kept vegetable garden beyond. I knocked at the kitchen door, and a trembling but sweet voice called out: "Who be you? Come right in!"

After I pushed the door open, at first I saw nobody; then in the living-room beyond the neat kitchen I could see a little old woman who was lying on a couch. At her side were a low stand and a vase filled with fresh roses, and the face she turned in my direction itself suggested a kind of flower beauty. It was the brightest and most cheerful of old faces, and the eyes were the clearest and most sparkling of old eyes.

"Wish I could have let ye in!" she exclaimed. "But, ye see, I have to lie right here. What be yer wanting?"

"I thought a glass of milk would taste good," I explained. "But I'm so sorry I disturbed you."

She laughed a merry little laugh. "Disturbed me! I'm so glad ter see somebody! When folks come it's al'ays a picnic. Had an idee it was milk. Oncet in a while a fisherman comes along, and it's al'ays milk. Seems like city folks craves milk; guess city milk ain't like what we has up here in these mountains. But help yerself! Th' spring-housen be right back th' kitchen. Ye'll find a glass on the cupboard shelf—side th' stove."

So I helped myself, and returned and thanked the cheerful invalid. And it so happened that I had a copy of a recent newspaper, and when I handed it to her she was delighted.

"When Sturgis be at the mill, sewin' and knittin' and readin'—that be my life," she said. "Doc Miller says I'll never walk ag'in, and I have an idee he be right. But Sturgis can't give up. That's al'ays the way with Sturgis; he's made so he can't never give up nothing he's got his heart sot on!"

It was not until our second year in our "Secluded Valley" that I came to know Sturgis. When I did, I understood why his wife, as we naturally supposed the little invalid to be, considered him "sot." His face was generally well shaven, and it held the most unrelenting expression I have ever seen on a human countenance. His features might almost have been cut from granite, and until he spoke you might fancy that even a crowbar could never pry apart his lips. It was impossible to get below his sheath of forbidding austerity and reticence, and you never could have guessed that when with the little invalid he became so different that he was not the same man. Two or three times I happened to be near the cottage at the streamside of an evening when he returned from his mill, and I heard his greeting at the open door; and once, when I left a few trout at the kitchen, I beheld Sturgis at the side of the couch, a Sturgis that was the antithesis of Sturgis at the store or on the highway.

At first, while we were looked upon as strangers, it was difficult to get anybody to talk about Sturgis and the invalid. I felt sure that a story, possibly what reporters call a "big story," lurked at the side of the couch and behind the granite face, a story that would never come from between those stern lips themselves.

At length, on the third year of our fishing the clear creek of our valley, I heard the tale of Sturgis and the bed-ridden little woman. It was told me one evening on the porch by our host, a low crescent moon almost touching the top of "Glade Hill," which loomed dimly far down the valley, and night-hawks occasionally uttering their weird cries above us in the clear sky. He began by saying:

"Course ye won't repeat what I tells ye—that is, in this here vally. There be them what don't be knowing the worst of it, and I says, better let bygones be bygones!"

"Sturgis and me was raised close to one another, down the crick a piece," continued the mountaineer. "We fished together, and swum together, and went to school together. We calls Eunice his wife, but she ain't—not a reg'lar wife. She ought ter have been, though. And the fust day Eunice come ter school, the sweetest and prettiest little gal ye ever see, teacher sot her right 'longside Sturgis. And afore long we was al'ays poking fun at him 'bout little Eunice. Ye knows how boys be, and how puppy love comes sometimes when a feller ain't had his fust galluses!"

"Time swung on and on, further and further. And sin' that fust day at school, if there was any fetchin' and carryin' fer Eunice 'twas al'ays Sturgis! When Sturgis was 'bout twenty-two or three, he and another man—I won't name him—ye've seen him, mebbe; I'll jes' call him he—began courtin' Eunice. He was a good looker, and he had a way with him as tickled th' gals. Seemed like at a dance he al'ays got his pick. There be fellers like that, and some of 'em, like him, be made of mighty rotten timber.

"We were all expectin' it's sure a hitch atween Sturgis and Eunice. Must have been a quarrel, though folks never knew. Anyhow, all of a sudden, he—the rotten-timber he—and Eunice goes over ter Claryville and gits married—kerflop!"

"They settles way out ter Downsville, and pretty soon we hears he ain't treatin' Eunice as she deserved—bein' as she's pretty and sweet and good as she kin be. Then time swings on further, and a daughter and a son is borned, two year apart, and all the time we hears he keeps right on treatin' Eunice the way she didn't deserve and hadn't ought ter be treated. She couldn't speak to another man but he was so jealous mad that we hears he don't speak to Eunice fer days and days. Much worse things he done, but nobody sensed it till Sal, that was the gal, got 'bout 'leven and begins ter talk to her gal friends. Sometimes when he'd come home and didn't feel jes' perky, and mebbe dinner wasn't ready—and what with his jawing and she slavin' fer him, Eunice had begun ter be sickly—he'd chase the kids outen the room, and they'd hear their ma sobbin' and sobbin'. And oncet Sal tells how she runs right in, and there was him a-lickin' her ma with a strap!"

"All them years Sturgis didn't say nothin' much ter nobody. Seems like when Eunice got married he froze right up and hain't never thawed out sin'—only ter Eunice. Twicet a month he al'ays managed ter have business over ter Downsville, and folks said he sometimes talked mighty harsh ter Eunice's man. But till Sal began to tell things, I don't think even Sturgis sensed how bad Eunice's man was.

"Then, 'bout the time Sal be fourteen, and it happens on a night when Sturgis was at the Downsville Hotel, and Sal said it began by his jawing Eunice 'bout Sturgis and how years don't make no difference 'bout his comin' oncet awhile ter see her, Sal runs acrost ter Jason Pembroke's housen, right opposite.

"He chased Ma with a horse-whip! Sal screeches. 'Ma's tumbled down the cellar stairs, and she can't git up!'

"Now Sturgis had a deal fer some tan bark t'other end th' town, and a ter two of the wimmen neighbors gits Eunice on a sofe, and she tells lies 'bout her man, and tells how she slipped on the cellar stairs, going down fer potatoes, one of the wimmen runs out inter the street and finds Sturgis, and she knows the truth, how Eunice's man chased her with a whip. And right up she tells Sturgis.

"Eunice's man is outen in his barn, and Sturgis goes right out there, and he shets th' barn door, and he puts the bar on. And what he done to him folks never knows. But the next morning they found him with his nose broke and his face smashed pretty bad, stayin' in the barn, fer he daresen't come out, fearin' Sturgis will do more ter him. He carries them scars yit.

"Then Sturgis comes to the housen. 'Pack Eunice's trunk!' he says to the wimmen. 'Pack Sal's and the boy's. I'll hitch up. To-night I takes them over to my vally housen!'

"So that's how Eunice comes to live with Sturgis. There ain't never been no divorce, and her man never dared say nothin', 'cept one time at the store of a Saturday night, when he come over ter th' vally ter trade off a heifer. We was quite a crowd in the store that night, and Sturgis is there 'longside the stove—'twas in the fall and mighty cold. He makes some remark 'bout wimmen livin' with men as isn't their rightful husbands, low-like, but I guess he wants Sturgis ter hear, and Sturgis did.

"Sturgis says nothin', but he steps right over ter him, and he takes him by the collar and he yanks him outen th' door. And the fust thing we all knows Sturgis lifts him up as ef he was a kid and slings him inter th' big spring which ye've seen 'longside the store steps. Then Sturgis pushes his head down till we all thought he's drowned, and when his head comes up Sturgis pushes it down ag'in. Nobody interferes; we all wish Sturgis will drown him. Then when the head comes up ag'in Sturgis says, iron-hard like, 'Ef ye ever comes inter th' vally ag'in, I'll kill ye!'

"He never did come ag'in. And sin' Eunice was chased with the whip by her man down the cellar stairs, and Sturgis carried her to his housen, she ain't never walked, and Doc Miller says she never will, but Sturgis he can't give up. And all them long years—that was more'n thirty year ago—Sturgis does mos' the work of the housen, cooks the victuals, and all. Sal married a man outen on the Hudson—he's a fruit farmer and done well. He's done nice, too, by Sal. But the boy, he died of typhoid fever. And sin' Sal was married Sturgis al'ays dressed Eunice every morning, and he carries her down ter th' sofe—always treats her like she was a little gal. And he does the chores, and cooks, and everything, besides his work at the mill. Never a harsh word to Eunice, as we all knows well, and fetchin' and carryin' fer her! Jes' as he used ter in th' old school days!"

"There be folks as has talked bad 'bout Sturgis and Eunice," added my host. "But fer years and years nobody's said nothin' much. And if ye asks me, I says Sturgis done jes' right. And, of course, as I says, ye won't talk about this—not up here in the vally!"

The following season it happened I fished alone, staying at a boarding-house some miles down the stream. One day I got a man to drive me up into the wilder part of the intervale, and as we passed the house of Sturgis, I noticed the shades were down in the living-room windows.

"Come two week ago she died; she's been gittin' weaker and weaker," said my driver. "They says Sturgis hasn't shown much ter folks what he feels. Jim Carter, who was over ter th' funeral, tells how Sturgis walked behind the coffin, his face jes' the sot Sturgis face—hard as nails. But they tells me sin' Eunice died he hain't opened up his mill, and I guess he feels it putty bad!"

The stream swings around back of a little church and a bit of a burial ground, the last open place toward the head of the valley. About dusk that evening, for I wanted to fish late, I came out through the streamside willows and across a narrow meadow; as my man with the team was to meet me at the cross-roads just beyond the church sheds. It was a breathless evening in early July. The robins were twittering their evening songs, and back of me on the mountain side veery thrushes were singing their plaintive lullabies. At my side was a low stone wall which bordered the burial ground, and just beyond the wall was a mound of newly turned up yellow earth. One end was a mass of freshly cut mountain laurel, which was then in pink bloom everywhere on the mountains. And at the other end of the grave kneeled a man whom I recognized in the soft dim light as Sturgis. In the absorption of his grief he would not have seen me even if I had been beside him. His head was bent low over the grave, and he was sobbing aloud, sobbing as a child sobs.

My throat clutching me and my own tears wetting my face, I tiptoed away. But as I thought of the many years of devotion of the man kneeling at the grave of the woman he had so loved since she was a little girl, I was glad I had seen him and heard his sobs. It is good for us to realize that pure love and perfect devotion are found elsewhere than in books.

VESTED STUPIDITY IN PROPERTY AND POLITICS

BY FREDERICK M. DAVENPORT

Mr. Davenport, of the Department of Political Science in Hamilton College, and now Republican Senator in the New York Legislature from the Oneida District, needs no introduction to our readers. His articles in The Outlook during recent years on political and social questions have attracted wide attention. He has in the past been closely and intimately associated both with Theodore Roosevelt and ex-Governor Hughes in liberal movements within the Republican party. He believes that if that party is to avail itself properly of its present opportunities it must be still further liberalized. As a result of some interesting talks which we have had with him on the future of the Republican party, he has at our request written the following article, growing out of his experience during the past winter in the New York Legislature.—THE EDITORS.

IF the attention of the people of the country were not at this time fixed upon the culmination of the peace parleys in Paris and upon the prolongation of certain tragic events in Europe, the American public would long ago have taken notice of the picture accidentally painted by the evidence recently offered to the Judiciary Committee of the New York Senate in the so-called traction slush-fund investigation. The testimony filled many columns of the metropolitan journals, but to the uninitiated reader it seems to have made something of the impression of an opera bouffe entitled "The Pot Calling the Kettle Black." Act I: Enter the traditional lobby-runner with the hair-raising suggestion that a fund of five hundred thousand dollars will be forthcoming to enthrone a senator in the gubernatorial chair, if the senator will free from the entanglements of his committee a bill which in good time may make possible an increased rate of fare and the relief of a great traction corporation from imminent bankruptcy. Act II: The senator at luxurious luncheon with the political chief musician who is charged with playing between courses upon the harp of hope and aspiration to beguile the representative of the people from the path of public virtue. Act III: Violent reaction of the representative of the people and investigation by eminent senatorial gentlemen in toga, revealing little about slush funds, but unconsciously sketching in the rough much about vested stupidities in property and politics.

It was all about the so-called Carson-Martin Bill, named after the Senator and Assemblyman who introduced it, each in his respective house. This bill empowered a public service commission of the State of New York to increase the rate of fare which a traction corporation might charge, even though the terms of an existing contract between a municipality and a private company had definitely established a fixed rate. The technical constitutionality of the proposed measure had the support and also the opposition of men of high intelligence and integrity. The question of the justice or sound policy of altering one term of a contract without the opportunity being given to alter other terms, perhaps burdensome to the municipality and the people, gave more concern to thoughtful legislators than the question of constitutionality.

But it is not this phase of the matter to which I am especially directing attention. What is revealed by the record of the investigation is in a sense an anticlimax to a system of pressure long exercised by public utility and other property groups upon the institutions of government at the legislative centers of our commonwealths.

The public utility especially interested in this bill was the Shonts subway system of New York City. The city of New York is a more or less hopeful and influential quasi subway partner, and some day, now near half a century off, is, please Fate, to become the sole owner. The traction situation in New York City is alleged to be precarious. As the result of greatly increased cost of operation since the war began, the contract with the city as to rate of fare is claimed to be no longer profitable. It should be profitable, both for the sake of the city as quasi partner and for the sake of fairness to the corporation. And the same principle applies to all public service companies. There ought not to be difficulty among intelligent parties in interest about laying all the cards on the table face up, and, arriving first at a fair valuation of the property, determining next what the utility must earn in order to meet its fixed charges and a reasonable return on capital invested. When so much is determined, of course a municipality should agree to a rate of service which will yield this reasonable amount, or else should be willing to absorb any deficit by taxation. A service rate so fixed should be periodically adjustable up or down, upon proper certification to the municipality and the utility by a regulatory commission that the established rate is yielding more or less than enough to bring the return agreed upon. Such a plan would not lack for public favor. A city is profoundly interested in the efficiency of public service corporations and their fair treatment. They are vital means to her comfort and welfare. The people of the country give no evidence of sympathy with the efforts of politicians to ride into office on the back of ruined utility companies. The public is not interested in any broad extensions of municipal ownership, whatever may happen in particular cases and under particular conditions. Public opinion is far too healthy in America normally to espouse Bolshevism or any considerable measure of Socialism. The private property interests and their eager political supporters have long been unnecessarily stupid in their methods of warding off what seems to them to be impending evil.

These stupid methods have their roots in a now distant past. In the earlier years these utilities were regarded as the legitimate prey of legislative "strikers," who introduced harmful bills in order to be bought off. And in what was deemed self-defense the utilities began to make legislatures a part of their sphere of influence, to an extent of which the public has probably not yet even dreamed. These utility corporations, traction, gas, and electric, are now hoist by their own petard. It is difficult for them to secure from political representatives of the people either fair play or just favor. The same irrevocable law of compensation which brought prohibition upon the hapless and stupid brewers and distillers is operating now upon public utilities. Slush funds and secret intrigue and official spheres of influence are now of little avail.

Hence the humor of what unfortunately seems to appear to a considerable portion of the public to be only a rather tragicomic revelation of the old stupid and futile methods of trying to wish through a legislature a bill to help public utility corporations out of an alleged deep and dismal hole. We have in the testimony a picture of quiet meetings between representatives of the property group in interest and certain Republican leaders who do not at all represent the spirit or purpose of the party itself in State or Nation; and then the reluctant introduction of the bill at least in one house as if it were of a doubtful nature; followed by the alleged suggestion of the lobby-runner to the Senator about the slush fund, and then followed by an arrangement alleged to have been made by the Republican State Chairman for the Senator to lunch with a former Republican Governor actively employed in building up a practice at the law in the city of New York. The Senator's testimony paints a picture of the luncheon, the dangling before his vision of the delightful prospect of reaching the Governorship on the same ticket with the former Governor running for United States Senator, or at least of the legislator's attaining to the lofty heights of legal eminence and profit in the great city where the former Governor, according to the Senator's testimony, depicted himself to be reaping richly the rewards of public name and fame! And then, if the unvarnished record of the apparently undisputed portion of the testimony is to be believed, it seems that the little matter of the Carson-Martin Bill, so important to the welfare of the Shonts subway situation in New York City, was brought into the picture. Says the up-State Senator's host, as we have it in substance in the testimony: Now, Shonts would like to have you be for the bill and report it out of your Public Service Committee. It is a good bill. And I have no retainer. Later Shonts of the subway property goes on the stand and testifies that a retainer of $10,000 was paid a few days after the luncheon. And the chief counsel for Shonts testifies that the terms of the retainer had been arranged the day before the Senator and the former Governor met at luncheon. The answer of the Governor to this seems to be that the check for the retainer had not been received at the time of the luncheon, and that anyway it was a general retainer and had no particular application to the Carson-Martin Bill.

In describing the present order of politics in the New York Legislature, the testimony of the Senator furnishes these final touches:

"People don't go around Albany with a bag of money any more. The whole situation is one of subtle suggestion, and also of tying in honest legislators by outworn rules of caucus 'regularity.'"

And the Senator sardonically adds: "It is all done in a strictly up-to-date, twentieth-century fashion."

The ominous thing about this picture is the evidence the testimony seems to offer of the over-ambitious desire on the part of unwise representatives of the property group and on the part of certain shortsighted Republican leaders to play feebly and fatuously at the old stupid game, to the embarrassment of sound property right and of open and aboveboard party politics. Such a system no longer represents, if it ever did, the best thought of the capitalist group or of the genuinely wise and able party leaders.

Of quite another sort, but of the same ominous nature in its relation to the continued prestige and success of a reuniting and rejuvenating Republicanism in the country, was the attitude of blind opposition maintained at Albany, by the Republican leadership and the representatives of still another great organized property group, to the programme of sane and progressive human-welfare measures proposed by the great labor and women constituencies of the State. I have no wish or purpose to speak harshly or slightly of either the Republican leadership or the property group opposing these bills. So far as the leadership is concerned, it seems to me to be sincerely but heedlessly callous to the social needs of the time in which we live. So far as the organized property group which strongly opposed these measures is concerned, these men are, I think, temporarily blinded by having their eyes too intensely fixed upon the light of their own affairs, and they are also misled by the vast misrepresentation fostered by their professional representatives. The method of lobbying against these human-welfare measures on the part of those who pretend to represent this great property group is worthy of description by itself. It was neither corrupt nor illegal nor strictly improper from the standpoint of the very lax rules of the modern lobby, but it was very potent in temporarily darkening counsel with misinformation, and in giving many thousands of working people and some members of the Legislature an entirely jaundiced view of the relation of measures of human welfare to rational human progress. And it had the whole-hearted support of the Republican caucus machinery in one house of the Legislature.

But the fact which struck me most forcibly in this legislative battle for these measures of human welfare was the clear attempt of certain Republican leaders and their property supporters outside to impress the public mind with the notion that these measures of liberalism, such as the living wage, health insurance, and the eight-hour day for women, were in reality measures of Bolshevism and dangerous to human welfare. The attitude of these shortsighted leaders and their powerful business supporters seemed to me precisely the attitude of the reactionaries in Europe after the Napoleonic Wars. The reactionaries of Europe after the Napoleonic Wars sought to defeat the movement toward liberty and democracy by confusing the social disorders in some parts of Europe with the struggle for liberty and democracy. And the result of the attempt to set up a false barrier against normal human progress was that liberty and democracy came in Europe only through further bloodshed and revolution.

This is what Roosevelt saw so clearly. Years ago he said:

"Certain persons call me radical. They do not realize that I am trying to save their children from a radicalism of which they have not dreamed."

If the property interest had listened to Roosevelt a decade ago and had been willing to intrust him with further power, the great war would at least have been shorter, many billions of wealth would have been saved, not to speak for the moment of human lives, and America would now be far on the way towards a thoroughly stable social order that would strengthen and not weaken the tremendous natural forces of American individual initiative.

The greatest breeder of Bolshevism and Socialism is blind Bourbonism. The doctrine of the Bolshevik and Socialist is that the power of organized capitalism can so affect and deflect the course of representative popular government that there is no hope in it. Some aid and comfort is given to this twisted philosophy by the activities of both property and politics in matters connected with legislative happenings in the State of New York.

The greatest danger from Bolshevism is not disorder. There is little danger, to my mind, from Bolshevik disorder in this country. But there is grave danger of the growth of the Bolshevik philosophy. The Bolshevik philosophy, as I understand it, maintains that men of ideas, of organization, of invention, of management, of initiative, are fit only to black the boots of the proletariat. Without the just and powerful legal and social protection of men of ideas and invention and organization and management in this country, there would soon be neither property nor welfare for the mass of the people. There would be no boots to black. It is very proper that a machine gun should be used upon leaders of Bolshevik disorder. But if the leaders of blind Bourbonism make it appear to the hundred millions of the American people that there can be no progress through the existing political and governmental organization, Bolshevism may be bred so rapidly as to render machine guns powerless against disorder.

There are other signs in the State of New York and elsewhere in the country that reaction thinks it sees its opportunity to check liberalism by an appeal to the bogey of Bolshevism. East of the Rhine there is wild social chaos. In England, on the contrary, there appears to be a calm and level political sense which is wisely meeting and solving industrial issues as they arise, and seeking to ameliorate the condition and satisfy speedily the long-expressed social desires of the mass of the English people. In America there are some signs that the tragic lesson of the war has not been so well learned. It would be in the highest degree unfortunate if the leadership, or any considerable portion of it, of the Republican party, perhaps soon again to be intrusted with power in the Nation, should become at this critical juncture tainted once more with the spirit of disunity and reaction. Lack of thorough organizing financial sense and a pandering tendency seem to stamp the Democratic party as more and more likely to become the party of a radical liberalism in America. What the Republican party ought to be is the trusted channel of a conservative liberalism, guided by men who have justly earned the support of the mass of the people, and who at the same time inspire the confidence of men of conservative management and power. Modern America on this side of the great war has no place for a party of reaction. And it will not have a dominant party of radicalism unless the natural party of conservative liberalism should seem to drift toward reaction.

Men of property, men of management and business initiative, need the just protection of a party of conservative liberalism. Such men ought to be the last to allow such a party to be besmirched in public esteem by stupid and stealthy methods of lobbying and intrigue. The only safety is in admitting the undisputed facts, and in sitting down in the open with all the parties in interest to work out the perplexing and difficult problem of industrial relations which have become in the modern world the core of the wholesolution of good government and social order.

No more is it safe to seek to dam the stream of human betterment in America. It can be done, but the dam will not hold for more than a decade. The individualistic development of the older generation need not be lost, but may be reinforced and strengthened by certain of the simpler social processes which will safeguard American initiative under the changed industrial conditions of the new generation. To attempt to foreclose debate upon measures of liberalism by the cry of Bolshevism is evidence of an enfeebled party intellect which invites early disaster.

The Republican party can win permanently its old place in the confidence of America only by the power of the Roosevelt tradition. And the Roosevelt tradition was not simply straight Americanism, so called. It was above everything else a belief in the progressive amelioration of the inequalities and injustices which under modern economic and social conditions increasingly rankle in the hearts of the mass of the people. And it included naturally the protection of the property interests and of the men of ideas and business genius and initiative by the simple process of insisting that these interests and these men act openly and wholeheartedly in the spirit of public service. It is only by the power of the Roosevelt tradition that the American people can permanently prosper and the Republican party permanently triumph.

WHAT THE BOLSHEVISTS HAVE DONE TO RUSSIA

BY ALESSANDRO H. CARASSO, PH.D.

In an article published in The Outlook for May 28, 1919, Dr. Carasso, who is an American citizen, and who was released from prison by the Bolsheviks after paying a ransom, described some of his personal experiences in Russia. He arrived in Russia in 1910, and was a witness of some of the effects of the terrorism of the old reactionary régime under the Czar, and now has just come from Russia after witnessing the still more terrible effects of the régime of the Bolsheviks. However opinions may differ as to what ought to be done about Russia, there can be no doubt about such facts as come from this credible witness.—THE EDITORS.

DURING the first year of the war, when America was still protecting German interests in Russia, it befell me as courier to visit Germany. These were the days of conquest, entire provinces of Poland, Belgium, and France with their enormous resources having quickly come into German possession. Nevertheless, all was not aglow in political circles. In response to my inquiry came the constant reply: "The whole world is against us. . . . Now if the revolt should break in Russia. . . . then our victory would be assured. With degenerate France and 'watery' England we can reckon at will." America was not seriously considered then—it was merely a "paper hero."

When the February Revolution suddenly broke forth in Russia as of its own accord, when the reins of rule passed into the hands of such loyal and devoted sons as Milyukoff, Count Lvoff, Guchkoff, Shingáref, and when the rhetorical phrases of Kerensky were reaching far beyond the Russian borders, Germany was startled momentarily into awe, confusion, and terror. The early days of this great and wonderful bloodless Revolution presaged a genuine republic, such as the United States, conceivably, of whose power Germany was now gradually becoming convinced. Imagine a republic of two hundred million souls! In all of Germany's cosy dreams she never pictured such a nightmare. But this fright was short; the first decree of Kerensky, absolving the ten-million army of respect to officers and discipline, was sufficient to revive the German hope immediately. The enemy became more active than ever. Thousands of agents with car-loads of gold poured across the undefended Russian borders—and the carousal began. With their assistance, the habit of fraternizing was restored between Russian and Teuton soldiers. This fraternizing among the "international proletariat" was preached by thousands of Russian revolutionists, whose General Headquarters was in the gorgeous palace of the dancer Kshesynskaia. Machine guns and cannon looked with a friendly eye from every door and window. The gory Bolshevik pennant, blazoned with flaring inscriptions of pure German gold, flaunted proudly over the old city of Peter the Great. With the aid of these adventurers, literally showered with gold, Germany succeeded in accomplishing what the Imperial armies could never do, namely, to bring about the collapse of a formidable nation of two hundred millions!

Thus was laid the foundation of the bloody Bolshevik army.

SOVIETS

In Petrograd, Moscow, Kiev, and other big cities councils—or soviets—were formed by these new rulers of all Russia. These councils were assemblies, or parliaments, comprised of delegates supposedly chosen by soldiers, workingmen, and peasants to represent them. These delegates were sent from the smaller localities to act in a higher center, and so on.

The peasants were very conscientious in their election of representatives. They chose spokesmen of undoubted character, as a rule, to champion the needs of the rural electorate with honest vigor. But such spokesmen no sooner arrived at the higher center than they were submitted to scrutiny by the presiding officer of the soviet with a view of ascertaining their sympathies toward Bolshevism. Woe betide them if the examination indicated a lack of sympathy, for the lot of the so-called counter-revolutionist, or "enemy of the people," is unenviable.

The councils were in this manner stuffed to the brim with honest-to-goodness Bolsheviks whose personal interest gained in precedence during their "legislation," which was ostensibly intended to promote the welfare of the populace.

Lenine's first decree compelled all Russian landowners to surrender their possessions to the rightful rulers of the soil—the peasants.

When this transfer of land rights had been consummated, the peasants, naturally, awaited the bestowal of these lands upon them by the soviets. Had not this property been confiscated in their name? Indeed yes; but, in spite of this fact, the soviets did not revert these lands to the peasants gratis.

For an exorbitant price that almost doubled that asked for by the former landholders the soviets offered this confiscated property to the peasants—poor deluded "rightful rulers of the soil!" Thus arose the first clash between the peasants and their soviet "representatives."

The peasant now realized that he had been swindled, and began to protest. But of what avail was the plaint of a common boor against an array of bayonets?

The moujik was forced to acquiesce meekly in this fiasco, for he was in dire need of soil, in need of bread. True, not all of the bread he produced belonged to him. For while he could toil from sunrise to sunset on his soil, its growth belonged to the communistic soviet. The laboring food-grower could consume only his one pound of bread per diem; the distribution of the rest was in the hands of the soviet agent. This procedure proved to be indigestible for the rustic understanding.

The difficulties of crop-raising in the recent season have been enormous. In addition to the extortionate cost of land, the peasant found himself confronted with the lack of tools. Russia had failed in the last few years to promote the agricultural implement industry; import has been impossible; and the peasant resorted perforce to primitive methods. I know cases where farmers actually fashioned plowshares from wood and saplings. Since oxen and horses had been confiscated, it was only natural to span wife and daughter in the yoke (the son was probably killed in the war). The minor implements were so rare that fifteen-copeck ( $7\frac{1}{2}$  cents) reaping-hooks were sold for 20–25 rubles, scythes for 75–125 rubles, each, and purchase of these was possible only under duress.

The proverbial patience of the moujik was consequently strained to the bursting point—and finally it burst! Then ensued a bitter life-and-death struggle between peasant and soviet.

The Russian people have from time immemorial been accustomed to seek succor beneath the benevolent shadow of the Church. The clergy, mostly descended from rustic ancestry, now extended comfort to their suffering parishes and counseled them to evade these unjust "laws" of the soviets, to conceal their produce under ground, in the roof-thatching, etc. Soon the soviets became aware of this union between Church and peasant, and a terrible oppression of the priests resulted.

In the province of Caluga, where my estate was located, a tragic episode occurred. The peasants, indignant at the exploitation of the soviet, organized an armed force, under the leadership of some abbots whose monastery was the rendezvous for defense. The local soviet, apprised of this "uprising," sent a band of several hundred armed Bolsheviks to overwhelm the monastery, but the attempt was unsuccessful. A hurry call for aid was sent to Moscow, one hundred miles away, and immediately the higher soviet furnished an expedition of an entire regiment of Lettish mercenaries, accompanied by four armored cars and supply trains. These attacked the monastery at midnight, and before noon of the next day reduced the monastery, village, and entire surroundings to a heap of ashes. The few remaining monks were hung upon a few remaining door-posts. Scarcely anything was left undestroyed—even the produce for which this struggle was fought. For what use was bread when disobedience to Bolshevism was in question?

After this victory of Peremishl, as the village was called, a reign of terror was instituted against Church and clergy over the land.

The first victim was the kindly liberal sage Bishop Theophane, of the Caluga Province. This pious theologian, whose

BISHOP THEOPHANE

A liberal Russian prelate whose bishopric was violated and whose property (both personal and ecclesiastical) was confiscated by the Bolsheviks, and who is believed to have been murdered. The inscription on the photograph is: July 21 (Aug. 3), 1918. To my devoted Alexander Pavlovitch Carasso, a remembrance of Theophane, Bishop of Caluga and Borovsk radical writings are renowned beyond the boundaries of his land, came from a noble lineage and was endowed with a great measure of academic and juridical learning. Being of a profoundly liberal temperament, he was persona non grata in the Czar's régime. Prior to the February revolution he had been ordered before the court on a charge of defending a deacon who in drunkenness committed an act of lese-majesté—having called the Czar a dunce-head. It was said that the Bishop claimed that his deacon had spoken in drunkenness what many thought in sobriety.

Such a figure of outspoken liberal tendencies was a victim of Lenine-Trotsky oppression. In the midst of night agents broke into the bishopric to search the possessions of the sleeping Churchman to drag him to the soviet. His horses and carriage were confiscated, his cow sequestered. The old man was a vegetarian—yet they left him not even the least nourishing edible. The soviet made his life impossible. Before I left Russia I heard a report that he had been mysteriously murdered.

Bishop Theophane is only one of Russia's clerical martyrs. Brutally have the sons of the Church been massacred and the monasteries despoiled. The treasures of ages have been shamefully torn from sacred relics and shared as booty by Bolshevik pilferers. Holy places have been transformed into stenching barracks; learned, dignified theologians have been thrust by means of blows and threats into the uniform of soviet soldiers. And the righteousness of Christ has departed from Russia—forever? That is for the world to answer.

Who comprise the soviets, the actual rulers of the country? Mostly illiterate persons, unable to sign their names, and of high criminal pedigree. Their life creed was learned in prison and their training in the ways of robbery and murder.

When that great political charlatan Kerensky bethought himself to open the jails, a great many criminals were released who were clever enough to ally themselves with the Socialist party. They were received with open arms. The impress of their chains on ankle and wrist were marks of honor.

But during the first Provisional Government, at the head of which stood such idealists as those of the Prince Lvoff Cabinet, these criminals had little opportunity to share in the government.

Only after October 21, 1917, when Lenine and Trotsky usurped power, these ex-murderers obtained their first chance to assert themselves. From the street-corner meetings of the Bolsheviks these ruffians learned to prate from Karl Marx. The reign of terror began with the imprisonment of the capitalists first, and then of any one else suspected of having property. Every house and club was raided. Twice was my purse the victim of socialization.

I remember one midnight raid upon our club. The doors were burst open. "In the name of the Revolution!" entered a host of Red Guards. They were specialists in their craft. They left no an article of value on the premises. They knew all the hiding-places.

This all occurs under the guise of authority. Factories, homes, shops, are daily confiscated—or "socialized"—under these self-same mandates.

In the midday a commissar enters your office and tells you that your office is to be surrendered to the Government. You do not protest, for if you do you are condemned as a counter-revolutionist. Until the last autumn the commissars were not so harsh in the case of your dwelling. They merely confiscated your rentals and luxuries, but allowed you to occupy your premises and pay rent to the soviet for your own property. But for the last few months, since they started their system of "equal distribution," you are not allowed to hold a room for yourself, but you are forced to quarter together with Red Guard families or homeless tramps. But if the Government needs your premises for their purposes you must vacate within twenty-four hours.

"Enough for the rich, now let the poor be supreme," is the new watchword.

Zinovieff, the Governor of Petrograd, originated the beautiful idea of a Week of the Poor, a "Nedilia Biednoty," consisting of hundreds of robber bands which daily search all residences equipped with commissars' mandates, in order to take away what they can. If one has a new and old overcoat, one is left the old overcoat. If one has two pairs of old and three pairs of new underwear, one is left two pairs of old underwear. If one has two blankets, the better one is taken.

What such robbery means to the poor Russians can be understood from the following price scale:

	Rubles.
Shoes, per pair . . . . .	300-600
Overcoat . . . . .	1,000-2,500
Suit . . . . .	1,500-2,500
Socks, per pair . . . . .	15-60
Blankets . . . . .	200-1,000

SCHOOLS AND TEACHERS

Things are going very badly with professional people in Russia. The plight of the public school teachers is sad indeed, and the situation in regard to the schools is very curious. I know a great deal about this at first hand because three of my wife's sisters are teachers and I have friends who are teachers—some of the teachers who were killed on the day when the Constituent Assembly was called were women whom I knew. On that morning some teachers went out on the Petrograd streets with banners applauding the Constituent Assembly, and they were shot at from the roofs and forty were killed.

The schools are suffering because they have no paper, no ink, none of the materials needed—most of all, no books. The lack of books is due to more than one cause. When the Bolsheviks started to change everything, they decided that they would change the Russian alphabet and grammar and make them easier. So they first took away three of the thirty-six characters in the alphabet. Two of those were useless enough, but the elimination of the third one, the "i," causes a good deal of confusion. Then they made "simplifications" in the grammar and spelling, and they made a rule that no one should publish books written according to the old ways. But they couldn't get books printed the new way. All the teachers had was a sheet of paper with the new Bolshevik grammar and spelling rules; so everything was at a standstill.

They decreed that all teachers should have a two months' course in learning the new rules; but then the teachers said, "What about the children? Shall we require them to use the new methods when we haven't any books?" Then it was decided that for the first year the children might use the old grammar and spelling while they were trying to learn the new, so now things are every which way, as you can imagine. Otherwise I think the schools would probably be better than they were under the Czar. The public schools were very poor then.

The real plight of the teachers, however, is not concerned with books, but with food. A public school teacher gets a salary of five hundred rubles ($40-$50) a month and belongs to the second category in the population. She works from nine in the morning until three to five in the afternoon, and she can't live on a quarter of a pound of bread and perhaps a few potatoes. If a teacher is to be sufficiently fed to go on with her work, she must have more food, and it will cost her on an average about fifty-five rubles a day. Many of these young women, too, are trying to support their mothers or other relatives. I know one very lovely young teacher, a member of a family to which Lermontov, the poet, belonged, who is trying to keep herself, her old mother, and a sick sister alive on five hundred rubles a month. In the school where she is there were one hundred and ten teachers last year; now there are sixty. And I think most of those who are gone literally starved to death; the rest went on the streets.

A touch of irony in the teacher's situation lies in the fact that the Bolsheviks do try to keep the school-children well fed, and that the teachers, who are often literally starving themselves, must dole out food to the children each day!

UNIVERSITIES AND TECHNICAL INSTITUTIONS

If the conditions in Russian elementary and secondary schools are peculiar, those of the universities and technical institutions are even stranger. In the first place, most of the colleges and higher technical schools are closed. The two surviving institutions in Petrograd and Moscow are merely half functioning and have become—I know not what.

It must not be forgotten that in former years the Russian schools of higher learning were of premier rank. It was more difficult for one to enter a Russian university or technical school than presumably for a Bolshevik to gain access to the heavenly kingdom. The privilege of university study was possessed only by certain classes, and this only after a certain degree of maturity had been attained as the result of an eight-year course in the "gymnasium," or high school. Eligible entrants were ordinarily Russian in a restricted sense; as the Jews, for instance, could qualify for entrance only if gold medal winners in the aforementioned courses, and the number of even these medalists was restricted to one or two per cent. Thus was the sanctum sanctorum, the Russian university, almost impregnable. Indeed, during the last few years before the war, when Casso was Minister of Education, Jews were entirely prohibited from the benefits of higher learning. But credit must indeed be given to the Russian university; its students were the most truly cultured in the world.

When Czarism tottered and its Ministers were placed behind the bars of the Peter and Paul Fortress, the new Provisional Government made its natural step; it put aside all barriers and opened the universities to all qualified candidates, Christians or dissenters. Of course the ten existing Russian universities were immediately crowded to the point of congestion and it was found necessary to found new universities in different parts of the vast country. The masses, hungry for knowledge, enjoyed their full.

The Bolsheviks, usurping power, found this condition not sufficiently to their liking. They desired to "proletariatize" the Russian school of higher learning. Lunatcharsky, the Soviet Minister of Education, decreed that the eight-year curriculum of the secondary school be annulled. Examinations, requirements, etc., were all nil. Even academic credit for examinations previously passed was robbed of recognition. The new class of "students," often unable to write or read a line fairly accurately, was given the same rights as were accorded the really educated student of former days. The Russian world of scholarship, as of politics, became quickly infested with released jailbirds and deserters anxious to exchange their gray prison caps for blue students' hats. In a short time the genuine student found himself in an embarrassed position, for the newcomer abused him as one of lofty noble caste, and the former was even forced to abandon the walks of his beloved Alma Mater, whose shelter he had won only after arduous trials.

The professors at first protested, but Lenine replied to them curtly; if they would desert their chairs, they would be classed as saboteurs, in which event their salaries and food tickets would be withheld. If, however, the professors would yield to Lenine's programme, they would be placed in the "first category" and their salaries made the highest in the land.

What could the poor pedants do? Naturally, they yielded.

Imagine now the conditions existent in the revered Russian university.

HUNGER-MIGRATION

When bread became so scarce in the central provinces that even the peasants could not obtain it at any price, however exorbitant, the eyes of the masses turned to the Ukraine and Siberia for relief.

These fertile provinces had always fed central Russia in time of need. But since Kerensky's régime these had been declared "independent sovereignties." Access to them has become impossible. The All-Russian railway system has collapsed. Passenger service is nil save for Delegates—trains of two or three first-class carriages reserved for Bolshevik "representatives." Often cattle trains can be seen containing confiscated horses, cows, etc. And in this last mode of conveyance the peasants have managed their long journey to the distant fertile provinces in quest of bread.

The travel to the Ukraine, say from Moscow, normally eighteen to twenty hours in duration, now occupies five or six weeks. But when one has enough courage, patience, and money one can overcome this obstacle. Partly by cattle train, partly by wagon, mostly on foot, one can ultimately scrape one's way to the outer provinces of plenty, to the God-blessed Ukraine, where bread and potatoes are plentiful and where they can be sold by the peasant owner to whomever and for whatever he pleases.

Lenine's agents gradually detected this secret hunger migration. Warning was immediately sent broadcast that returning "passengers" found in cattle trains with contraband food in possession would have it confiscated. A vigilant border inspection ensued. Peasants driven beyond the border for bread and anxious to return to their hungry families on the precious soviet-sold soil met these Bolshevik guards with vehement opposition. The feud waxed in terror. Armed caravans of peasants, several hundred strong, set out in armed defiance. Finally a vast avalanche of bread slaughter swept over Russia, until the communistic authorities saw the futility of it all and compromised by allowing a bi-weekly passage to every citizen supplied with about forty pounds of wheat. The bread feuds somewhat abated.

But worse calamity has arisen. The agricultural populations of Siberia and the Ukraine had formerly been greatly dependent on the factories of central Russia for clothing and shoes. Now this supply of manufactured commodities had ceased. Meanwhile their own supply of food was being depleted by the Germans, their new protectors. So they began voicing a genuine demand for these manufactured articles, finally decreeing that no foodstuffs were to be allowed into central Russia unless accompanied with an exchange of linen, leather, etc. But where could the poor Russian peasants obtain these finished commodities? Whatever was in sight had already been confiscated by the Bolsheviks.

Helpless, defrauded peasants, deluded "beneficiaries" of the Revolution, ground like their own chaff between the millstones of the gods! Is it any wonder they start to cry out in despair for their Czar of old, who, though a despot, protected them from robbery and murder?

THE PLIGHT OF ARISTOCRACY

Before the markets in the big cities were closed (they were closed in November) the sight was common of an aristocratic lady, vestments in hand, abused by a rough soldier for demanding a high price for her wares. Since November 1 such scenes have deteriorated to worse.

As is well known, most of the aristocracy in Russia were in the military service. The first assault of the Bolsheviks was on the "military caste."

The plight of the dependents of this class, bereft of defenders and fortune, is beyond conception. They cannot even sell papers. Suicides have been common; hunger deaths even more common. Some have gone upon the streets. Often can be seen the frail, refined figure of a former noblewoman wending her way along the Nevsky Prospekt in the midst of rain and cold in the pursuit of bread for her children.

I was accosted by one such figure and recalled the voice; it was the well-known baroness whose hospitable Fridays were long ago known all over Russia; indeed, she was a close friend of the Imperial household, and her husband died among the first days of the war on the battlefield with Archduke Oleg Konstantinovich. She saw that I recognized her, and the moment was painful.

Folk-kitchens have replaced the restaurants. The private purchase of food is forbidden, and citizens are compelled to resort to the public bread line, often waiting for hours with their meal tickets for their day ration.

The public kitchen affords a dish of hot water and dirty cabbage, sometimes potato or strong-smelling fish, for three rubles fifty copecks. It is indeed a pleasure to enjoy this after waiting in line through zero weather for five or six hours in company with thieves and beggars. But to have the privilege of eating in these kitchens one must belong to the first two categories.

WHAT IS THE WORLD'S TASK WITH REGARD TO BOLSHEVISM?

Ought the world to interfere in Russian interior affairs? It ought not—but it must! The Russian tragedy is international. And the intervention must come immediately, for every moment's delay adds to the enemy's strength, to his security and brutality.

It is most dangerous when the enemy begins to believe in his own strength, and it must not be forgotten that the Bolsheviks have gathered most wonderfully in the past few months an army of a million, an army which is young, powerful, and enthusiastic. These are fanatics, who have no concern for their lives, regarding death merely a sacrifice for the sake of humanity. From this terrible, brutal, and impractical Bolshevism they have derived a new religion, "a creed for the International Proletariat."

We know how harmful is such religious belief. But the half-developed workingman has more faith than knowledge; and in this lies the greatest danger, for faith and fanaticism go hand in hand. In short, Bolshevism is a religious sect, with a God called Ruin.

Like all sectarian movements, Bolshevism is quite infectious. With gigantic steps it is striding the world. To-day there is no country but shelters a nest of this sickly sect. And this is after only one year of its existence in the far north.

I am astonished at the world's indifference to this danger. We hear that what is happening in Russia will never happen here. This naive self-assurance is absurd. Why only Russia? Why only Germany? Austria? And the newly revolting Hungary? What mean the frequent labor strikes in England and France? Those outbreaks—how I know them! All three revolutions which I witnessed began with the same symptoms.

What now is the duty of the world? The first step is to send a big reserve of food, clothing, and other supplies to those in Russia who are fighting Bolshevism. Another step is to allow volunteers to be enlisted from the soldiers and citizens of the free countries of the world to go, not to fight Russia, but Bolshevism. Another step which I wish it were possible to persuade the Allied nations to take would be to send a mighty army under their own flags to aid the Russian armies that are fighting against Germany's agents and adventurers, the Bolsheviks; but if this step cannot be taken now, the other steps can be and ought to be taken. The purpose must be absolutely altruistic, for in this altruism lies the hope of the world.

The next step necessary is to start a world-wide movement against Bolshevism. An international bureau of talented, convinced, and competent anti-Bolshevik missionaries must be established in order to preach the gospel in factory, on battlefield, on ship, in church. Naturally, we must also start a special press to spread a wide, popular propaganda in all languages to enlighten the international proletariat on the Bolshevik danger to itself; start a propaganda against propaganda.

Russia was a sufficient experiment. The tens of thousands of idle, starving workers speak for themselves. The demoralization brought by the Bolsheviks into Russian industry will be transmitted into other lands rash enough to try a dangerous experiment too. You remember that neither Peace Treaty, League of Nations is possible while this perilous weapon of madmen threatens the world.

Last spring there was a moment when 50,000 to 60,000 men could have been sent to Bolshevism. Unfortunately the Allies did not profit by this opportunity. Now, as I have implied, we need an army—an army of at least half a million. And you must not forget that this is the last chance. After another year no power on earth will be able to conquer this venomous beast.

PRAYERS

BY FLORA SHUFELT RIVOLA

I used to try to bring God close
With words that I called prayers.
Now words are like the tattered clothes
A broken body wears :

For you are never far now, God,
And words are useless things
To a spirit that has learned at last
That it has wings.

Now prayer is just a harmony
Of bud and glow and breath,

With never fear's least tremor
At thought of death.

Only, sometimes, so human I,
Fear will come creeping in
For one I love—then I grow old
Again : God, is it sin

That I forget your nearness so ?
And I reach out and try
To wrap me in the broken words
I thought I had laid by.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF HAMPTON'S FIFTY YEARS

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE

THE fiftieth anniversary of Hampton Institute, in Virginia (the pioneer industrial training school for the Negro and Indian races), celebrated on May 1 and 2, extended in influence far beyond the confines of the school, accentuating the necessity for good will and co-operation between all the races of mankind at this time when human relations throughout the world must be put to the ultimate test of friendship between—not master and slave any longer in name, but employer and employee. For, as one of the speakers said in extolling Hampton's type of industrial education, "any work into which a man can put his own heart and mind and say, 'This work is mine—the expression of my energy and my will'—that work is the work of a free man and not of an industrial slave."

Hampton to-day is a fully equipped industrial village, as well as a training school for teachers; and as the anniversary visitors—who had come from all over the South and by special train from the North—wandered among the fine buildings and over the well-kept grounds it was hard to realize how dark had seemed the future of the penniless and pitiful freedmen gathered here a half-century ago, when Armstrong, almost alone in his educational campaign, challenged the incredulous with his faith in the possibilities of the Negro race. Hampton has grown beyond even its founder's dream, for, like a powerful wireless station, it now sends its message to every part of the world.

Armstrong's Great Idea, the training of selected youth as teachers and leaders of their own people, founded on the conception of racial self-help and on the dignity and worth of work, has flashed its promise of progress to all so-called backward races. And the white world is just catching up with Armstrong, whose ringing motto, "Labor for the sake of character," is peculiarly applicable to present-day conditions. The war has indeed defined the trend of modern thought as a denial of those extremes in human relations which allow one group to lead lives of leisure without work while another group is forced to know only work without leisure. The Rev. Dr. Ashby Jones, of Atlanta, Georgia, who spoke at the anniversary exercises, emphasized just this point of Hampton's service to the country at large (one of the many indirect fruits of Armstrong's genius): so had Armstrong's influence helped to dignify labor that Southern white men had come to feel no loss of social prestige in wearing overalls by day and evening clothes at night. "And," continued the speaker, "I will go so far as to say that the time is coming when no man will be considered to have the right to wear evening clothes at night who has not—metaphorically, at least—worn overalls by day."

Armstrong's practical application of filled at this anniversary by the new Principal, the Rev. James B. Gregg.

The most important event of the first day of the anniversary was the dedication of the school's beautiful new auditorium, Ogden Hall, erected in memory of Robert Curtis Ogden, the lifelong friend of Armstrong and of education, of whom Mr. George Foster Peabody (the senior trustee of Hampton), who made the presentation of the hall, declared, "It is probably true that no one man has done so much personal work in bringing about an interweaving of minds and an intermingling of hearts of men and women of the North and men and women of the South as this true believer in all men, both his loyalty and his ability in France, met with prolonged applause.

An address of great power was made by the Rev. Dr. Ashby Jones, who emphasized Hampton's encouragement of racial self-respect and the recognition of the talents of the Negro. Coming as it did after the stirring singing of Negro spirituals (the Negro's great offering to the music of this land), Dr. Jones's plea that the Negro in America develop his own gifts and consider himself a prologue to that racial speech which Africa's silent millions have yet to utter to mankind—this plea that the very name "Negro" be handed down as a blessing and a pride and not as a curse, seemed but to put in words what the eloquent and poignantly beautiful Negro songs had already spoken. Not to imitate the white man merely, but to express himself, and thereby to enrich through his own self-expression the civilization of the world—this was the climax of Dr. Jones's exhortation of his Negro hearers. It was an exhortation that could well be made at this time to all races who are seeking a self-determination not political merely, but emphatically spiritual as well. And it threw into even greater prominence the forceful speech of one of Hampton's graduates of this year, an African who had come to Hampton straight from the Dark Continent, and who told of the condition of his people while pleading for the future of his country. The sounding of this new note of hope for Africa and the emphasis of the mission of the Negro in America as the prophet of the potentialities of his brothers on the Dark Continent—this welding of the solidarity of the black race in a long chain of development seemed to offer to Hampton's next fifty years an even deeper responsibility and loftier promise. This promise found a fitting symbol in Kamba Simaño, whose patient and determined quest of an education had led him to walk two hundred miles through the jungle to a mission station, whose past had been a primitive pagan kraal, but whose future was to be that dedicated service to his race which in him becomes an international incorporation of Armstrong's Great Idea.

For us in America the value of the Negro's cultural contribution was abundantly proved by a performance in Ogden Hall of a Negro play which closed the anniversary exercises. In characterization, dramatic values, and a subtle interweaving of humor and pathos these amateur black actors approached real art and clearly revealed the great talent of the Negro race in oratory, drama, and music. "We saw these same people," said a visitor, "demonstrating on the farm this morning the virtues of some improved incubators. They put the same enthusiasm into that demonstration that they have into their acting and singing to-night. To infuse industry with the quality of self-expression that inspires art, and to be able to turn from industry to art for recreation, is to have learned truly how to live."

Hampton, Virginia. NATALIE CURTIS.

THE FIVE GRADUATES OF HAMPTON INSTITUTE'S FIRST CLASS—THAT OF 1871. ALL WERE PRESENT AT THE SEMI-CENTENNIAL

"labor for the sake of character" has not only founded the principle for the sound advance of the Negro and Indian races in this country, but has served as a guide or comparison station for educational enterprises in India, in Africa, and in the Far East. Also it is safe to say that within the last fifty years the example of Armstrong's success has had much to do with an approximation to some ideal of "education for life" and the introduction of vocational training in the schools for white Americans. And perhaps one of the most significant tributes paid to Hampton on its semi-centennial was the enthusiasm of a Russian visitor, who exclaimed: "Here at Hampton I find the answer to the problem of Russia's uneducated millions and her vast peasant population. America could help Russia immeasurably by inviting a group of Russian educators to stay at Hampton and study Hampton's methods of correlation in academic, moral, and industrial training. Here is something definitely constructive in principle that should find wide application throughout my country."

For the widening of its influence throughout the country and across the seas Hampton has to thank Armstrong's successor, the late Hollis Burke Frissell, whose place as head of the school was who had faith in the real unification of his country and in the sure result of patience in well-doing." Those spiritual values at Hampton that have helped to mold thousands of lives owe much to Robert Curtis Ogden, for many years Chairman of Hampton's Board of Trustees, who through his formation of the conferences for education in the South and his work as Chairman of the General Education Board was one of the most constructive forces for the education of both whites and blacks throughout the South. His character and his career were the subjects of addresses by the Rev. Wilton Merle Smith, of New York; Chancellor Kirkland, of Vanderbilt University; Mr. Isaac Fisher, of Fiske University; and Dr. Francis G. Peabody, of Cambridge, Massachusetts.

The next day Dr. Moton, Principal of Tuskegee (himself a Hampton graduate), and ex-President Taft, the present Chairman of Hampton's Board of Trustees, dwelt upon the necessity at this time of reconstruction in race relations throughout the world for an increase of interracial good will in America. The hall was packed with white people and black, and it was hopefully significant that Dr. Moton's plea for justice and an equality of opportunity for the Negro, who had proved

THE WAR'S EFFECT UPON OUR ECONOMIC PHILOSOPHY

BY THEODORE H. PRICE

EDITOR "COMMERCE AND FINANCE"

JEAN BAPTISTE SAY, one of the ablest, if not the ablest, of the French economists, writing at the commencement of the nineteenth century, remarked that "the history of political economy is of little value, being for the most part a record of absurd and justly exploded opinions." Certainly he who has read even a few of the books upon economics that have been published since Xenophon wrote his "Economist" will be disposed to admit that the economic orthodoxy of to-day is often the heterodoxy of tomorrow, and that what our fathers considered radical frequently seems conservative, if not reactionary, to us, and will probably be regarded as utterly untenable by our children.

But as we run through the literature of economics it is nevertheless interesting to observe the reversion to the Socialistic ideals of Plato that is periodically manifest as the cruelty that individualism, logically developed, works to those not well endowed becomes recurrently apparent.

Plato's "Republic" may indeed be regarded as the first example of this revisionary tendency, for it was probably written after the "Economist," and advocates a community of property, and even of wives, that was in marked contrast and opposition to Xenophon's precepts for the judicious management of private estates. From that time on the philosophy of Socialism and that of individualism have been alternately in the ascendant.

The creeds in which these opposing philosophies have been expressed differ in words—for fashions in language as well as in clothes differ from age to age—but in the last analysis the ideals of Plato and Karl Marx are not widely dissimilar, nor is there in principle much to choose between Herbert Spencer's doctrine of the survival of the fittest and Aristotle's famous argument in support of slavery. The militaristic Roman Empire was logically materialistic, and, though its thinkers paid but little attention to economics, Pliny deploras the great estates, the latifundia, and the huge armies of captured slaves that were, in his judgment, responsible for the luxurious demoralization of the Caesarian age in which he lived. When the Empire fell, the unopposed concentration of wealth had become such an evil that the Christian Church of the Middle Ages inveighed against great fortune, and in the Corpus Juris Canonici (the body of canonical law) a community in the ownership of property is approved and is, in fact, decreed for ecclesiastical bodies, the care of the poor is made a religious duty, avarice is defined as idolatry and a violation of the second commandment, cupidity is forbidden as the root of all evil, usury is prohibited, and money-lending is discouraged as likely to lead to financial enslavement.

In the fifteenth century the Franciscans established the monts-de-piété or charitable pawnshops for making loans to the poor, and two centuries earlier St. Thomas Aquinas, while reluctantly conceding that trade was lawful because it was necessary, laid down the dictum that a seller could not ask more than an article was worth or omit to reveal its defects. The idealism thus inculcated was, however, soon found to be an impediment to the industrial progress that involved the use of either individual or borrowed capital, and so guilds came into existence, trade corporations were formed, loan and deposit banks were invented and established, and men commenced to study the mechanics of commerce and industry and codify the laws to which they were subject.

In this work Adam Smith, David Ricardo, Jeremy Bentham, and John Stuart Mill were the leaders in England.

From the economic laws which they thought they had discovered they deduced the doctrine of laissez-faire, meaning literally, let people do or make what they choose. They were therefore opposed to governmental interference with labor or manufacturers and in favor of free trade, as well as the widest latitude in the accumulation and use of wealth. Toward the end of his life John Stuart Mill seems to have glimpsed the hardships for many that would result from the unrestrained application of the doctrine of individualism, for in his autobiography he claims to have "seen a little further than the old school of political economy into the possibilities of fundamental improvement in social arrangements." In the eyes of that "old school," said he, "private property and inheritance appeared the dernier mot of legislation." The notion of attempting to redress the injustice "involved in the fact that some are born to riches and the vast majority to poverty" had, he admits, seemed chimerical to him in his youth. But "now," he asserts in his autobiography, his views would "class him decidedly under the general designation of Socialist," for he had come to believe that the whole contemporary framework of economic life was temporary and provisional, and that the time would come when "the division of the produce of labor, instead of depending as in so great a degree it now does on accident of birth, would be made by concert on an acknowledged principle of justice." "The social problem of the future," he asserts, will be "how to unite the greatest individual liberty of action with a common ownership in the raw material of the globe and an equal participation in all the benefits of combined labor." In writing this, Mill, though he does not admit it, was probably influenced by the philosophy of Karl Marx, who was almost a contemporary and lived in London from 1850, where he died in 1883, ten years after Mill had passed away. Mill was, however, a subjunctive and expectant rather than an unconditional Socialist, and it was during his lifetime (1806-73) that the English and American industrial organization made possible by the steam-engine came into existence and created the capitalistic class against whose economic domination Marx was such an aggressive protestant.

There are, in fact, but few who realize the comparative novelty of what Marx calls capitalism, meaning thereby the individual or corporate control of large wealth. When George Washington died, he was the richest man in America, being worth, it is estimated, $500,000, chiefly in land and slaves. In Europe, prior to the nineteenth century, the great fortunes, none of which would be considered large to-day, were also mainly in land and were in the hands of the aristocracy and monarchs.

Corporate property was almost unknown, for the act permitting the formation of "limited" companies was not passed by Parliament until 1855, prior to which time the unlimited liability of a shareholder put his entire property in jeopardy and made stocks an unpopular form of investment.

In 1850 the entire National wealth of the United States, including slaves (said to have been valued at $2,000,000,000), was estimated at only $7,000,000,000, as against $250,000,000,000 to $275,000,000,000 to-day, and, though I have not been able to find any dependable estimate of the wealth of Great Britain prior to 1860, the collateral figures of the public debt and revenue seem to indicate that eighty per cent of the national capital or wealth of the United Kingdom, estimated at $130,000,000,000 in 1914, had been accumulated since 1850.

In 1800 London had a population of less than one million souls, and the total foreign trade (exports and imports) of Great Britain was only £68,000,000, or less than one-twentieth of what it was in 1913, when it reached £1,403,000,000. Statistics without end could be adduced to show the tremendous rapidity with which the world's wealth has been increased within the last one hundred years, but they would be wearisome, and the figures given will suffice to make it clear that great wealth, as we and our children know it to-day, is almost entirely the result of man's discovery that a machine driven by steam, electricity, falling water, or gasoline can be made to do the work for which the energy of hundreds or thousands of persons would otherwise be required, and that the labor thus saved, again multiplied by the aid of power-driven machinery, can be used in the production of additional wealth. This may seem very elemental, but there are so many who think of wealth as the result of buying and selling that it is necessary again and again to reiterate the economic definition which asserts that "wealth consists of all consumable utilities which require labor for their production and can be appropriated or exchanged."

With this definition before us, we can better understand why it is that the world's wealth has increased so enormously since it became possible to multiply the efficiency or productivity of labor by the use of power-driven machinery.

No one will deny that an increase in the aggregate wealth of society is desirable. It is against the seemingly inequitable distribution of the increase by accident of birth or opportunity that the Socialist rebels, and it is because the war has weakened some governments and made others more conscious of the fact that their existence depends upon the consent and support of the governed that there is throughout the world to-day a general uprising and protest against any system which permits a single individual to amass in his lifetime or inherit a fortune which runs into the millions or billions and represents the labor product of thousands or hundreds of thousands of men and women.

While, as I have pointed out, similar resurgencies of Socialistic idealism are discernible in the history of the world's economic philosophy since the time of Plato, the present reversion seems likely to have a wider swing and to find a more definite expression in legislation than any that have preceded it. One reason for this is that there never was a time when the contrasts between wealth and poverty were so striking. It is probably true that the masses live in greater physical comfort to-day than ever before in the world's history, but their intelligence and their desires have grown and they have become correspondingly anxious to improve their condition.

Therefore it is that the man who, though working hard, is unable to do more than support his family feels that it is unfair that another should be able to make millions and enjoy the luxury or power that their possession implies.

Those few who have the millions may try to justify their financial pre-eminence upon the ground that they are cleverer than their fellows, but this explanation will avail but little in a democracy where the impecunious majority rule, and so it happens that our legislation tends constantly toward conformity with the Socialistic creed, which as formulated by Karl Marx included:

(1) Abolition of property in land and the application of all rents to public purposes.

(2) A progressive or graduated income tax.

(3) Abolition of all rights of inheritance.

(4) Confiscation of all property of emigrants and rebels.

(5) Centralization of credit in the hands of the state by means of a national bank with state capital and an exclusive monopoly.

(6) Nationalization of the means of communication and transportation.

(7) Extension of productive enterprises by the state.

(8) Compulsory labor, with the establishment of industrial armies, especially for agriculture.

(9) Combination of agriculture with manufacturing and a more even distribution of the population between town and country.

(10) Free education in public schools and the abolition of child labor in factories.

Those Americans, and there are many, who mistakenly think that Socialism and Anarchy mean the same thing will be surprised at the degree in which the Marxian programme has already been adopted. We have the graduated income tax and an inheritance tax that some regard as confiscatory. We have free public education, and child labor is abolished in England and in most States of the Union. In this country credit has been centralized by the establishment of the Federal Reserve banks, which are under the control of the Government, and in South Dakota the experiment of a State Bank is about to be tried. In Great Britain and most of Europe the telegraph as well as the mails are under Government control, and there is every prospect that the British railways will be nationalized, while we in this country are considering whether it is wise to pursue the same policy in respect of our own transportation system.

While the abolition of private property in land has not yet been attempted either in this country or in Europe, there has been during the war more or less extension of productive enterprises by the state, and it is but a short step from military conscription to the conscription of men for agricultural labor, which step, if taken, would probably be approved by a large majority of the people who are apprehensive over the cityward tendency of the population, by which Karl Marx was so alarmed. This review of the progress that has been made toward the realization of the Socialistic ideal and the degree in which that progress has been accelerated by the war will, I think, convince even the most stolid reactionary that it is idle to oppose a movement that has acquired such momentum or a tendency that reflects the hopes of so large a majority in a world that is constantly becoming more democratic. While it is inevitable that there should be mistakes and excesses—such as those for which Lenin and Trotsky are responsible in Russia—the revolt against the injustices of individualism is in the main intelligent and likely to succeed.

The question for the business man and the statesman to consider is, not how they can suppress or defeat this revolution, but how they can adjust themselves to it and direct it so that its just demands may be satisfied and the absurdity of those which are unjust may be made apparent. Writing in a recent number of the "Atlantic Monthly," Don D. Lescohier says: "If the war had ended two years ago, its issues might have been confined to international politics; but in the last two years the thought of the Western world has grappled with fundamentals. The laborers and peasants of Russia, the factory hands of England, and the common laborers of America have been fired with a vision of a new world in which their past sufferings will be replaced by a greater degree of welfare than they have yet enjoyed.

"Many people believe that America's reconstruction labor problem is a struggle between capitalists and organized labor over the question whether or not labor will retain the advances in organization and wages which it has obtained during the war. In my judgment, that struggle is but the opening skirmish of a much further-reaching contest. Millions of workers have been aroused to ask whether democracy is a reality when it is accompanied by the amount of unemployment, low wages, bad housing, and the like which have existed up to the present time. The peasants of Russia and of other countries are asking whether the land-systems of the past are compatible with democracy. In a word, the aroused self-consciousness of classes heretofore submerged will force a widespread struggle over fundamentals of social organization and social policies.

"The world has neither comprehended nor felt the full power of the forces underlying the radical Socialistic movements shaking Europe to-day. These movements are due to the cumulative discontents of generations. The Bolsheviki, the I. W. W., and similar organizations may be crushed as organizations, but this will not stifle the revolt they express. These organizations are concrete manifestations of the economic discontent of the peasant and laboring classes, and discontent is not cured by force. In ancient times the control of society was in the hands of landlords. During the later Middle Ages the capitalistic class emerged and compelled the landlords to divide social control with them. During the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries the skilled mechanics and small farmers forced a place for themselves in the political and economic control of society. Now the laborers of Europe and America, with the peasants of Italy and Russia, have emerged into self-consciousness, and demand participation in the management of the world's life. The uprising of these groups is due to causes that have been operating over a long period of time in Russia, Germany, France, England, Italy, the United States, and lesser nations—causes too fundamental to be dismissed with superficial concessions or crushed by political or economic force. Though they may lose in their early efforts, they will continue the struggle until they win self-government and justice.

"Those of us who believe in democracy, as contrasted with autocracy and anarchy, should waste no time. It is our task to discover the real causes of these movements, and to point out the social reconstruction which will remove them. It is idle for us to waste time denouncing Trotsky, Lenin, or other leaders. Those leaders have simply focused heartaches. It is the causes of the heartaches which should interest scientific men who believe in democracy and justice. We do not defend the excesses which accompany these movements—excesses due in part to a long-repressed sense of injustice, in part to ignorance, in part to criminal leadership, in part to the fact that criminal and tough elements gravitate into such movements to use them for their own ends. But we do insist that an uprising involving so much of the world's area and so many millions of men could arise only because of widespread, common grievances. One of those grievances, though it will be formulated by them in language which describes its results rather than the causes of those results, has been the labor-supply policy of modern capitalism.

"Capitalists, and too many economists, have thought of labor as a commodity, and of labor supply as one of the instrumentalities conveniently provided to help the capitalist grind out products and profits. Labor has been a factor in production. Their thought has conceived the workman as a laborer rather than as a father, husband, and citizen. The human has been subordinated to the economic. But the worker has seen himself in an opposite fashion. To him his home and personal life were the important things, his labor but an incidental, necessary experience of his life. They saw him as a tool in production; he saw himself as a citizen. They saw no reason why he should not be satisfied when he got his wages;

he saw no reason for being satisfied unless he shared in the determination of the conditions, economic and political, under which he lived.

"It is this fundamental conflict in point of view which has made it so difficult for the employer and the worker to reach a common ground of agreement. One has thought in terms of business; the other in terms of human nature."

The statement that "one has thought in terms of business, the other in terms of human nature" reveals at once the fallacy of our economic philosophy in the past and the corrective that we must apply if our captains of industry are to retain their leadership in the future.

It is the human factor in the problem that has hitherto eluded us.

Perhaps we did not try to see it, perhaps we felt that an impairment of discipline might follow its recognition, perhaps it is impossible for the man who lives in luxury and whose children are well provided for to understand the craving and regrets, the hopes and fears, of him whose weekly earnings are spent before he receives them; but, whatever the reason, the fact is that there is a wide gulf as yet unbridged between those who must work to live and the class who control or distribute the capital out of which wages are paid. Sometimes it happens that the ranks of the latter class are recruited by a wage-earner who is able by superior strength to swim across this gulf, but the acclamation that greets the self-made man when he lands on the shore of wealth attests his rarity, and a very large majority of those who put on overalls in their youth wear them to the end.

This is perhaps inevitable. Most men are mediocre, and it is hard for mediocrity to rise above its source. We cannot hope to make millionaires of all men, and a condescending charity only increases the discontent of those who are its recipients.

How, then, are we to bridge the gulf? The answer is an old one. We must apply the Golden Rule. We must do unto others as we would have them do unto us were our relations reversed. This is extremely difficult, for it requires a facile imagination and an abundant sympathy to put ourselves in another's place and get his point of view, but it can be done, and when it is done most of life's misunderstandings are cleared up and we learn to love one another. I heard a soldier talking about the general of his division in France the other day. He said, "The boys would go through hell for him." I asked him why. He answered, "Because he messed with us when he could and took a personal interest in us—most generals never allow you to see them." Profit-sharing schemes are good, provided they do not restrict the employees' liberty of action. It is all right to encourage men to save and try to educate them to be thrifty.

Every stimulant to industry and ambition that can be devised is desirable, but without the personal touch and the sympathetic word that bespeak a consciousness of brotherhood and equality mere money, whether it be bestowed or saved, will not lessen the harshness of the eternal struggle between the few who are well placed or strong and the many who are less fortunate.

WHAT IS THE GERMAN THINKING ABOUT TO-DAY?

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE FROM ELBERT F. BALDWIN

THE Germans with whom I have talked are unrepentant at having caused the war. They still think it a conflict purely in the Fatherland's defense. They still believe that on August 1, 1914, the Russians crossed the Boche border and committed deeds of war in three places, hence Germany's declaration; and if France had to come in because bound to Russia, so much the worse for France.

They do admit, however, as did their Chancellor, that their violation of Belgian territory, made inviolable by treaty, was an international crime. But they still cling to the Chancellor's protest that "necessity knows no law." As to their soldiers' atrocities in Belgium, they either deny them with cool bluff or declare them to be no worse than those committed by others.

As to the U-boat murders, they regret them, as a man said to me, "only because they brought you Americans into the war."

As to the Lusitania horror, in particular, a Coblenzer had the effrontery to query, "Well, were not you warned?"

And as to the result of the war in general, the Rhinelanders do not seem dissatisfied with their performance. They did what they set out to do—preserve their country from invasion.

Ah, the supremely tragical thing about the war is that, aside from a bit of German Alsace, Germany was not invaded!

The other night I traveled with an American sergeant-major. (If you want to talk to our officers, travel first-class; if you want to talk to the non-coms., travel second-class; and to the men, third-class. I tried all three.) Well, my sergeant-major took issue with me. "Let Foch and those of us in the front trenches be the judges," he said. "I have spent two years there and in this area and in getting ready, and I know what war means. It means that some lives may have been sacrificed through green officers' mistakes. We don't want any more of that."

"Of course not," I replied; "but when the Germans asked for an armistice they did not really acknowledge themselves beaten, only checked on foreign soil."

"You would have had them pushed back over the border," said my sergeant-major. "Would Lorraine have seemed real German soil to them? No; we would have had to go to the Rhine, perhaps to Berlin. Would it have been worth the sacrifice?"

In that instant before my mind's eye there came the spectacle of what I had seen in France—roofless houses, whole orchards and forests annihilated, the very soil of the fields scorched deep down and still encumbered with great stretches of rusty barbed wire. And here everything untouched! Whether the fighting stopped too soon or not, I felt the everlasting rightness of France in demanding barriers and guaranties that shall defend her against another onslaught.

WEEKLY OUTLINE STUDY OF CURRENT HISTORY

BY J. MADISON GATHANY, A.M.

HOPE STREET HIGH SCHOOL, PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Based on The Outlook of May 28, 1919

Each week an Outline Study of Current History based on the preceding number of The Outlook will be printed for the benefit of current events classes, debating clubs, teachers of history and of English, and the like, and for use in the home and by such individual readers as may desire suggestions in the serious study of current history.—THE EDITORS.

[Those who are using the weekly outline should not attempt to cover the whole of an outline in any one lesson or study. Assign for one lesson selected questions, one or two propositions for discussion, and only such words as are found in the material assigned. Or distribute selected questions among different members of the class or group and have them report their findings to all when assembled. Then have all discuss the questions together.]

I—INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

Topic: Will Germany Sign? Ludendorff Speaks; Edith Cavell.

Reference: Pages 138, 139, 144, 145.

Questions:

1. Write out a list of German complaints over the Peace Treaty. Tell, with reasons, whether in your opinion the German editors are rendering service or disservice to the German people in making such complaints.
2. A few people in America consider the peace terms unjust to Germany and think the German delegates should not sign the treaty. Tell what you think of this position. (See The Outlook of May 21, 1919, for a summary of the peace terms.)
3. Many think that the Peace of Versailles makes militarism in Germany an impossibility. The Outlook is not of this opinion. Give your opinion of this question, submitting reasons.
4. What, in your opinion, does the treaty mean for the United States? Discuss.
5. Write about two hundred words on the peace terms and Edith Cavell.
6. State four or five lessons which individuals and nations should learn from the World War and the Great Peace.
7. Those who are looking for a valuable and readable one-volume history of the Great War will find it in "The Battle of the Nations," by F. A. Kummer (The Century Company).

II—FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Topic: In the Grip of the Bolsheviks.

Reference: Pages 148-150.

Questions:

1. What important things does Dr. Carasso tell us about Russia and the Russians up to the 1905 Revolution?
2. Can as much be said in favor of American music, letters, and art as Dr. Carasso says in favor of Russian music, letters, and art? Submit names and facts. How does he account for the power of the Russian artist?
3. Write out a list of the evidences which the writer gives in defense of his statement: "The Russia of to-day is entirely different." Why, according to Dr. Carasso, do the Bolsheviks persecute foreigners?
4. What is your explanation of Bolshevik beliefs and actions? Write about two hundred words on this question.
5. Make a careful comparison of the French Revolutionists with the Russian Bolsheviks. Discuss which are worse, in your opinion.
6. What does the writer mean by class "categories" in Russia? Tell what you think of this arrangement.
7. Present some political, social, and economic aims that the truly Russian people should adopt.

8. Read: "The Russian Democracy in the Struggle Against the Bolshevik Tyranny" (Russian Information Bureau, Woolworth Building, New York City).

III—NATIONAL AFFAIRS

Topic: Misrepresentation; A New Income Tax; The Short Ballot.

Reference: Pages 173, 143, 144.

Questions:

1. For what reasons does The Outlook consider the present condition of the meeting of a new Congress undemocratic and dangerous? Discuss whether, in your opinion, The Outlook takes the right stand on this question.
2. Explain why the present condition exists.
3. Tell why The Outlook considers the new New York State Income Tax Law a bad one and explain the recommended reform suggested by The Outlook.
4. Supply the proof to The Outlook's statement: "There are plenty of examples in history of civilized countries being hampered and halted in their national progress by unequal and excessive taxation."
5. If the budget system is all that The Outlook claims for it, what reasons can you give why all the cities, all the States, and the Federal Government have not adopted it?
6. Explain how this reform can be effected. What other reforms in city, State, and National Governments would you recommend? Reasons.
7. Explain carefully just what is meant by the Short Ballot Reform. Compare it with the ordinary ballot arrangement.
8. Give a brief history of the origin and growth of the Short Ballot idea.
9. Discuss the advantages of the Short Ballot principle. Do you think that the rights of citizens would be more sure of being properly protected by such a measure? Reasons.

IV—PROPOSITIONS FOR DISCUSSION

(These propositions are suggested directly or indirectly by the subject-matter of The Outlook, but not discussed in it.)

1. Democracy suffers most from the follies of its friends.
2. Perpetual peace will always be a problem.
3. There will never be another war between democracy and autocracy.
4. The days of the Bolshevik reign are numbered.

V—VOCABULARY BUILDING

(All of the following words and expressions are found in The Outlook for May 28, 1919. Both before and after looking them up in the dictionary or elsewhere, give their meaning in your own words. The figures in parentheses refer to pages on which the words may be found.)

Ameliorate, predicament, doughboy (138); reactionary (148); ballet, human realism (149); staccato, ruble, copeck (150); procedure, national progress, financial fabric (143).

EVERYONE IS INTERESTED IN PERIOD FURNITURE

THE fame of such designers as Chippendale, Heppelwhite and Sheraton endures like the fame of Shakespeare. The genius of these old masters wrought so great an artistry and grace in the furniture which they created that cultured people today insist upon its reproduction or adaptation for modern needs.

The history of artistic furniture design began several hundred years ago and perhaps it is not too much to say that it ended with the eighteenth century. Progressive phonograph manufacturers for several years have offered their phonographs in expensive period cabinets running into thousands of dollars in cost. The Edison Laboratories reproduced various famous cabinets at prices ranging as high as six thousand dollars.

It was characteristic of Mr. Edison that he said: "If period cabinets are desired by people who are willing to pay several thousand dollars for an Edison Phonograph, why not put all Edison Phonographs into period cases and let everyone have the best there is in cabinet design?"

Mr. Edison's word is law at the Edison Laboratories. Henceforth (with the exception of two models designed for summer cottages) each and every New Edison—no matter what its price—will be encased in a period cabinet.

The NEW EDISON

"The Phonograph with a Soul"

HOTEL COMMODORE
New York City
25 June, 1919

THESE wonderful new moderately priced Edison period models will be on exhibition for the benefit of the furniture lovers of New York City and vicinity, ten A. M. to five P. M. June 25th. Those who do not live in the Greater New York district will find their local Edison dealer glad to give full information concerning the new models.

Our new de luxe catalog, a complimentary copy of the magazine Along Broadway and the booklet What the Critics Say will be sent you from the Edison Laboratories upon request.

can now be obtained in artistic and authoritative period cabinets from $155 to $6000. The new line of moderately priced period models ranges from $155 to $300. NOTE: When you buy the New Edison in Mahogany, you get genuine mahogany and when you purchase it in oak, you get selected quarter sawed white oak of the highest quality.

The Official Laboratory Model, also known as "The Three Million Dollar Phonograph," sells at $285. It is furnished in Chippendale or William and Mary, at the election of the purchaser.

THOMAS A. EDISON, Inc.
ORANGE, N. J.

The above prices are United States prices.

MISS ELSIE DE WOLFE
of New York City

AMERICA'S most celebrated designer of household interiors has placed the stamp of her approval on these new cabinets:

"The period cabinets which Mr. Edison has adopted for his phonographs are in pleasant contrast to the rather grotesque cases which one so frequently sees. From the characteristically diminutive and graceful Heppelwhite to the costly replicas of historic pieces, the superior furniture value of Edison cabinets can scarcely fail to impress the lover of good furniture."

McCutcheon's

Linens for Summer Homes, Yachts and Clubs

"THE LINEN STORE" has long made a special feature of furnishing appropriate Linens for Summer Homes and of supplying outfits of Linens for Yachts and Clubs.

Our stocks of Damask and Fancy Table Linens, Bed Linens, Towels, etc., are very large. The greater part of these goods was purchased many months ago, before the prices of Linens advanced to their present level.

McCutcheon prices are, therefore, lower in general than the prevailing market prices, and indeed, in many cases, are as low as the prices now asked by wholesale Linen merchants for these same Linens.

Damask Linen Table Cloths and Napkins

These Linens were just received from bond. Linens of these qualities are not procurable from manufacturers today except at considerably higher prices, if at all.

Breakfast Napkins, $7.00, 7.50, 8.00, up.

Dinner Napkins, $8.75, 9.00, 10.00, up.

Table Cloths, 2x2 yds., $7.00, 7.25, 8.00, 8.50, 10.50 and up. 2x2½ yards, $8.50, 8.75, 9.50, 10.00, 12.00 and up.

We have also received from bond a variety of Cream or half-bleached Irish Damask, which is especially recommended for Yachts, Clubs, Bungalows, etc., as it stands very hard wear.

Cloths, $6.75, 7.75, 8.50, 9.00, 9.75 each.

Napkins, $7.75 per dozen.

72x72 in. piece goods, $4.25 and 4.50 yd.

Fancy Linen Suggestions

Moderate-priced Linens from Ireland, Madeira, France, Spain, Italy, China and Japan. Hemstitched, Lace-trimmed and many kinds of embroidery.

Luncheon Sets in White and dainty-colored Embroidery. 25-piece sets $6.50 to $75.00 set. Fine Lace sets up to $285.00 a set.

Scarfs for dining-room and bed-room, in all popular sizes, and also in unusual sizes, $1.25 to 65.00 each.

Afternoon Tea Cloths and Napkins, round and square, made in plain Linens, figured Damask, embroidered and lace-trimmed.

Oblong Luncheon Sets of seven and thirteen pieces. A very attractive assortment $21.60 to $95.00 set.

Also a choice selection of Tray Cloths, Breakfast Sets, Chair Ties, and Table Covers.

The Luxury Tax does not apply to Linens

MAIL ORDER SERVICE: Any of the merchandise described above may be ordered with complete satisfaction through our Mail Order Service

James McCutcheon & Company
Fifth Avenue, 34th and 33d Sts., N. Y.

THE NEW BOOKS

This department will include descriptive notes, with or without brief comments, about books received by The Outlook. Many of the important books will have more extended and critical treatment later

FICTION

Cricket (The). By Marjorie Benton Cooke. Illustrated. Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City.

Gallant Lady (A). By Percy James Brebner. Duffield & Co., New York.

Labrador Days. Tales of the Sea Toilers. By Wilfred Thomason Grenfell, M.D. Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston.

Our House. By Henry Seidel Canby. The Macmillan Company, New York.

Written with thoughtful care and also with a sense of humor. It deals as a problem with the puzzlement of a young man forced by circumstances into business when he has literary ambition and with his attempts to be honest with himself and fair to others. There are distinct quality and substance in this novel.

Tale of Mr. Tubbs (The). By J. E. Buckrose. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

The laughable adventures of an over-modest man pursued by misunderstanding and absurd suspicions. Farcical but amusing.

Wooden Spoil. By Victor Rousseau. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

A stirring tale of the fight against fraud, collusion, and violence made by a young American who has left to him by will a Canadian timber tract. There are dramatic scenes of action and a love romance with the daughter of a French "seigneur," a survival of the old régime.

POETRY

Without the Walls. A Reading Play by Katrina Trask. The Macmillan Company, New York.

No event in history is more full of dramatic possibilities than the martyrdom of Jesus, even when bereft of its divine significance. Yet we do not know that, except in the Oberammergau Passion Play, its dramatization as an acting play has ever been attempted. Ben Hur is not a real dramatization of the culminating tragedy of the life of Jesus; Parsifal only portrays a symbol of the great sacrifice. Bach's Passion Music comes the nearest to a dramatic interpretation, and Bach largely uses the Scripture narrative and depends upon music to interpret its emotional meaning. The title of Mrs. Trask's dramatic poem hints to the reader her method. It is distinctly a reading, not an acting, play. The love story is made to bring out vividly the contrasted Pharisaic and Roman characters, and the simple Hebrew piety of that age is effectively portrayed in Alcada and her nurse-companion. The effect of the crucifixion on Jew, Greek, and Roman is the more effectively indicated because the scene itself is not put upon the stage, but the story is narrated by Nicodemus, and the effect of the narrative on different characters is brought out in their responses. Mrs. Trask has accomplished with simplicity and dignity her difficult task to make human and real this greatest of all dramas. If she had attempted more, she would have accomplished less.

WAR BOOKS

De la Sympathie à la Fraternité d'Armes. Les États-Unis dans la Guerre. Par Maurice Barrès. Librairie Félix Alcan, 108 Boulevard Saint-Germain, Paris.

The author dedicates this volume to his fellow-Lorrainer and friend, M. Fernand Baldensperger, who is now, we are glad to say, a professor at Columbia University.

THE BRUSHES OF THE WAR
WHITING-ADAMS
BRUSHES

DO THEIR PART TOWARD CONCEALING THE BIG GUNS

Their own bang-up goodness cannot be concealed.
Quality sticks out all over them. Call for them at any dealer in brushes. Send for illustrated literature.

JOHN L. WHITING-J. J. ADAMS CO., Boston, U. S. A.
Brush Manufacturers for Over 106 Years and the Largest in the World

To realize the volume's full force, one should see on French soil the many proofs of the advance from sympathy to friendship between French and American armies and peoples. If there is one thing to-day which seems even more assured than Anglo-American friendship, it is Franco-American friendship. The latter rests upon the instinctive, spontaneous understanding of each other by two peoples, speaking different languages, it is true, and with strikingly contrasted traditions, but with an elasticity of mutual comprehension which no power can prevent coming to abundant and fruitful results. The present volume well deserves translation.

Curtain of Steel (The). By the Author of "In the Northern Mists." The George H. Doran Company, New York.

A graphic description of the work of the British Grand Fleet and the campaign of its watch over the North Sea.

Navy and the Nation (The). War-Time Addresses. By Josephus Daniels. Introduction by John Wilber Jenkins. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

Most readers will be surprised that a man who has been as busy as a Secretary of the Navy must have been during the war could find time to write and deliver so many dignified, appropriate, and occasionally inspiring addresses as are here collected. Most of them, indeed, are short; but this is a virtue that is not the less welcome because it is an unusual characteristic of this kind of discourse.

MISCELLANEOUS

Food Crisis and Americanism (The). By William Stull. The Macmillan Company, New York.

In this volume the author shows that we must shun the tendency towards impoverishing our rural population; otherwise we may have Bolshevism sooner than we think. He also shows that our farms are more heavily mortgaged than ever before. Nor is it because some men are tenants and others labor for a wage that the situation is pathetic, but because most men, so the author alleges, labor with little hope of ever acquiring a competency.

Twelfth U. S. Infantry, 1798-1919. Its Story. By Its Men. Illustrated. G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

Great pains and skill have been taken to make this history of this veteran regiment of Regulars both complete and entertaining. In every war since the Revolution the Twelfth has done its part, and, although it did not reach France as a body in the great war, many officers and many hundreds of men trained in the Twelfth did fine service abroad. The scores of articles, sketches, and pictures in this handsome volume all are the work of members of the regiment.

World's Classics (The). The Oxford University Press, New York.

New volumes in this collection of books of permanent value are constantly being added; some of those which have just reached us are numbered in the third hundred of the series. The volumes are of pocket size, on thin paper, and have portrait frontispiece wherever possible. It is said that a million and a half copies of these little books have been sold. Looking over the list, one is impressed with the variety as well as the real value of the books included. Like the Oxford "Books of Verse" and other series published by this house, "The World's Classics" is a real contribution to knowledge of literature and encouragement of taste in reading.

Motor Car Enamel

Dries over night

Don't Sell Your Car 'til You're Proud of It

Mechanically, a car ought to be a good performer for two or three years at least, if properly handled.

But if it looks like junk, it will fetch junk prices. Perhaps the only reason you think of selling it is because it needs about two dollars worth of Da-cote Motor Car Enamel.

Would you enjoy much self-respect in clothes you had worn for two years, day and night, in mud, rain and dust? Then how can you take real pleasure in a car that badly needs a new dress?

Go to a professional painter if you can spare the car for a couple of weeks. His fine work is worth all it costs.

But a Da-cote finish, applied by yourself some afternoon, will please you immensely. You'll be proud of the job and proud of the car. It will sell for a good price if you are willing to part with it.

Da-cote consists of the finest Murphy Varnish and best pigments ground to the smoothness of cream. It flows on so evenly that no brush marks show. It dries over night.

Let us send you the name of a merchant who sells Da-cote, and a book of colors which will aid your selection.

THE NATION'S INDUSTRIAL PROGRESS

Believing that the advance of business is a subject of vital interest and importance, The Outlook will present under the above heading frequent discussions of subjects of industrial and commercial interest. The department will include paragraphs of timely interest and articles of educational value dealing with the industrial upbuilding of the Nation. Comment and suggestions are invited.

THE GOVERNMENT AS A TRANSPORTATION SURGEON

BY WALTER F. EVERARD

WHEN a blood-clot forms and clogs the human arteries, a skillful surgeon applies the knife and relieves the congestion. In the same manner to-day the Government is endeavoring to prune the Nation's transportation arteries, eliminate wasteful duplication, and bring the various commercial carriers into their proper sphere.

To accomplish this aim the Highways Transportation Committee of the Council of National Defense has been authorized to make an intensive survey of the country, to determine the relative provinces of the railways and commercial vehicles, with especial reference to the so-called "short haul." Twenty of the largest cities in the country are being used as the basis for the investigation.

The Committee undertakes its work, with the co-operation of the United States Railroad Administration, on the assumption that the short haul is a losing venture for the railways, owing to the costs of loading and unloading, which, it is claimed, are inadequate to compensate for the charges in such a short transit. If it can be established that such hauls can be handled as cheaply or cheaper by the motor trucks and at a profit, then one sphere of this mode of bulk transportation has been established.

Before such a contention can be upheld the figures of motor-truck costs must be ascertained; and this covers a wide field, because no concerted effort along this line has brought results. Where an effort has been made by operators of motor trucks to establish a cost system it has usually been on the basis of operating costs per day, without discrimination in regard to classification of goods. But even such cost systems have been scarce and comprise the first step in the Commission's task.

The greatest question for the Commission to solve is: Will the railways be able to abandon the short hauls entirely to motor-truck service, and, if so, can the motor trucks handle them exclusively?

Since the railways have taken short hauls, they solicit all of this business they can obtain, as every item decreases the net loss. Naturally, further inroads would only increase their losses. It would be an imposition to ask them to abandon any part unless the whole burden could be removed.

That brings up the other side of the question. Could motor trucks handle commodities like coal, grain, produce, or peat? Before any definite conclusion can be reached this query must be thoroughly sifted.

The last point, and one that will vary according to locations and density of population, is: What should constitute a proper radius from the city for motor-truck transportation?

In some cases the motor-truck short haul could be beneficially placed at from five to ten miles from the center of a city. In other places it might be fifteen miles.

The urgency of a settlement on the question is aggravated by the fact that gigantic road-building preparations for this year and ensuing years will tend to double, and perhaps triple, motor-truck transportation. The number of automobiles and motor trucks in operation in this country to-day is estimated at 6,146,617. During the past year 149.86 miles of roadway were completed under the Federal Aid Projects at a cost of $2,074,585.50. At the present time there are 536 Federal Aid Projects of highway construction under way, estimated to cost $39,017,066.33, of which the Government will pay $15,615,086.05.

Immediately available for highways construction under the Federal plan is Government money aggregating $40,000,000, to which must be added $48,500,000 appropriated by a recent amendment. On July 1 another $72,750,000 becomes available, being the total of the original and the amended appropriations. This is exclusive of some $7,300,000 appropriated for the so-called "forest roads."

To meet their share in these expenses nineteen States have already passed or else prepared for legislation good roads bond issue bills aggregating $589,300,000.

Of the many road-building projects now under construction with Federal aid, the largest is the Chicago-Clinton road, a part of the Lincoln Highway. On completion this road will be seventy-five miles long and will cost about $1,175,545.

The most expensive stretch under construction is the so-called Philadelphia Pike along the Delaware State line, a thoroughfare five miles long, which, it is estimated, will cost $111,774 per mile. In this case a part of the cost is involved in the building of car lines and will later be refunded to the State.

No definite time has been set for the completion of the investigation instituted by the Highways Transport Committee. It may take months. It may require a year or more of study. The mere fact that the Committee realizes the enormity of its task and the necessity for scrutinizing study emphasizes the place motor transportation has assumed in the Nation's commercial world.

"WHAT WILL AMERICA'S POOR ROADS COST THE PUBLIC THIS YEAR?"

BY G. A. KISSEL

President Kissel Motor Car Company

If a community does not improve its roads over which goods, supplies, foods, farm produce, and other necessities must be transported, then the people of that community are responsible for a part of the high cost to the consumer of such goods.

During the month of June the 1919 record winter wheat crop of over 900,000,000 bushels will begin to move. The spring and early summer fruits and garden produce will begin to appear at the markets: the first result of America's increased manufacturing programme for domestic and export consumption will be ready for transporting to shipping points; the Nation's building, expanding, and developing programme will be well under way.

of motor trucks being produced by the manufacturers to meet American industries' demand for rolling equipment; with thousands of expert drivers and mechanics of invaluable experience being released from the army; with the hundreds of motor truck transportation, express and rural routes being formed—it would appear that the only weak link in this Nation-wide transportation chain is that of poor roads.

Poor roads have proved to be the brakes on the wheel—the sand in the gears—of progress, creating chaos and stagnation in transportation and shipping.

The people of the United States eliminated those conditions that tended to slow up the pace on the way to Berlin. Are they going to stand for poor roads that slow up the industrial expansion of their own country? The percentage of increase in good roads and decrease in poor roads is the only answer worth while.

A DESERVING APPEAL

The Lebanon Hospital for the Insane, on the mountain above Beirut, Syria, in the establishment of which, under Theophilus Waldmyer, my father [Mr. Jessup's father was Dr. Henry H. Jessup, a distinguished American missionary-educator who lived and worked at Beirut, Syria, for half a century—THE EDITORS] was so deeply interested, has weathered the war with difficulty. It was made a center of Red Cross relief to the starving people in the Lebanon until stopped by the Turks. The Red Cross supplied the hospital with sheets, pillowcases, and blanket bags, so that it was able to continue its care of some of its patients, and in May, 1916, the Turks sent a lot of patients from the asylum in Damascus and paid for their keep in wheat. The men and women sent from Damascus were in a terrible state of dirt and disease, and brought dysentery with them, and many of the other patients caught it and died. The attempt to Ottomanize the hospital was successfully resisted.

The cost of supplying the hospital with bread during the war was estimated at 1,500 Turkish pounds a month. Dr. H. Watson Smith, the head physician, is sailing from London for this country on May 21. He remained at his post throughout the entire time of the war. The institution was stripped of almost everything that could be carried off, including the telephone equipment, but the buildings are undamaged, and the urgent need at present is for renewal of supplies, such as medicine, furniture, linen, and general hospital necessities. No money having been available for repairs and alterations during the war, this must also be provided. After the British occupancy moneys were advanced from the Foreign Office for keeping the institution going, but this amount must be repaid, as well as payments made for the supplies of wheat, rice, coffee, sugar, etc., supplied by the courtesy of the French and English authorities.

Persons interested in this unique work, who would be willing to confer with Dr. Watson Smith after his arrival, are earnestly asked to communicate with Henry W. Jessup, New York Treasurer, 55 Liberty Street, or with Mr. R. B. Haines, Jr., Secretary, 119 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia.

HENRY W. JESSUP.

BY THE WAY

Apropos of the Peace Treaty, two remarks overheard on the subway may be quoted. No. 1: "Strange! this treaty doesn't appear to satisfy anybody completely—even the Germans don't like it!" No. 2: "The Germans object to the terms as too drastic; but if they had won, what terms would they have imposed? Why, they'd just have made frankfurters out of us!"

The fiftieth anniversary of the driving of the golden spike which marked the completion of the first American transcontinental railway was celebrated at Ogden, Utah, on May 10. A replica of the "Jupiter," an engine which was used in the building of the road, was driven by the engineer of the original engine, and several other men who were engaged in the work of construction were present. These included three Chinamen, each over ninety years old. In the accounts of the driving of the golden spike no mention is made of the final disposition of that spike. Was it "lifted" by some impecunious prospector, or has it been placed in a museum of industrial curios?

A batch of letters from Mrs. Thrale, Dr. Johnson's friend, was recently sold at auction. One of them contains this anecdote: A neighbor's maid came to her with the request from her mistress for the loan of a book, which the maid said was "Milk and Asparagus Lost." Mrs. Thrale says: "I did immediately comprehend her meaning, and sent her Milton's 'Paradise Lost.'"

"Collier's" prints a picture of a Christ-like figure under which are the words: "Ever since I heard there was such a dream as a League of Nations I have prayed on my knees each night that it come true." The figure is that of Anton Lang, of Oberammergau, who takes the character of Christ in the Passion Play. He was recently interviewed by a correspondent of "Collier's," and expressed himself as above quoted, and added that he hoped that the Passion Play might be produced again in 1920, as "it might help bring the nations together again."

"A dressmaker recently back from Paris," the London "Sphere" says, reports that "black satin is all the rage in the Ville Lumière. Coats and skirts of it are worn with almost unvarying monotony. But one fairly gasps at the brevity of the skirts, though the Parisienne is undismayed and continues her progress in a skirt barely two inches below her knees with a calm and unblushing air of conviction."

"The number of sailors who during the war were dropped at the port of New York with no possessions but the clothes on their backs was much larger than could be publicly known," says "Shipping." These men, victims of the German methods of warfare, became guests of the American Seamen's Friend Society, and that Society's war records tell some strange stories. One of the remarkable incidents recorded is that of three survivors from one vessel who had each been at sea since boyhood, one thirty-five years, one thirty years, and one twenty-seven years, but had never been shipwrecked before.

An American newspaper man writes from Berlin that real leather shoes are kept in glass cases in the shoe stores there and labeled "250 marks" (about $62.50). He says that when he saw these prices he understood why he had seen this sign in the rooms of every German hotel: "Do not put your shoes outside the door for polishing. Give them personally to the Hausdiener."

Story writers are often at a loss to know what themes to employ; the editor of a popular magazine tells them what not to write about, as follows: He does not want "stories in which the man and the girl meet in a Pullman car, or in a Greenwich Village eating-house; stories of politics, of the occult, of college life, of the cow-country, or of A.D. 2000; stories and poems dealing with death"—of these last he says he "already has four hundred and three on hand;" which looks as though he had weakly accepted contributions he doesn't want or is unaccountably slow in returning them.

A correspondent discredits the quotation, "Many a little makes a mickle," and says that the real Scotch proverb is, "Monie mickles mak' a muckle." Mickle and muckle, however, are defined as the same thing—"a large amount or quantity; abundance." The Oxford English Dictionary says, under "mickle:" "Chiefly in proverb, Many a little (or pickle) makes a mickle."

An English clergyman, according to a humorous weekly, was astonished one day, while officiating for a friend in a remote moorland church, to see the old verger abstract a half-crown from the collection plate before presenting it at the altar rails. After the service he told the old man that his crime had been discovered. The verger looked puzzled. Then a sudden light dawned on him: "Why, sir, you don't mean that ould half-crown of mine? Why, I've led off with he this last fifteen year."

Social reformers will be encouraged by reading a passage on cretinism in a book called "How to Live." In 1900, it says, a traveler who visited Aosta, in Italy, found many cretins among the beggars in the streets, in the asylums, in the homes—"everywhere he ran across these awful apologies for human beings." But in 1910 he found only one! What had happened? "Simply a few resolute, intelligent reformers had changed the entire situation." An isolation institution had been established by the state; no marriages were permitted; and as cretins do not live long, they had become practically extinct.

When the fires of war have cooled down somewhat, salvage parties to hunt for scuttled treasure will doubtless begin to be active. One of the places to hunt for vanished gold will doubtless be North Keeling Island, where the Emden was beached when the Sydney ended the German raider's spectacular career. One of the Emden's crew, as recorded in a book entitled "Stories of the Ships," has confessed that when the raider was beached sixty thousand gold sovereigns, part of the spoils from captured English merchant ships, were swept from her decks into the sea. The coral reef where the Emden was stranded may yet give up this treasure.

The advertiser quoted below has lost his "Henrietta," but he might win a prize for having owned the queerest pet on record. The advertisement is from the columns of the "Evening Capital and Maryland Gazette," of Annapolis:

LOST—Pet turtle with hand-painted back; answers to the name Henrietta. Reward if returned to Capital office.

Cost versus Value!

THE great illuminated Metropolitan Tower clock cost $100,000 and it's worth it. It tells time night and day to thousands of New Yorkers—but its utility is limited to its immediate vicinity.

The Ingersoll Radiolite costs as little as $2.75, and because its dial is coated with a substance containing real radium, it glows your night time wherever you are. It's the watch that gave our soldiers in France better service than any other watch on the front—it's giving the same faithful service to thousands throughout the world now.

Imagine the convenience of this watch at night to the businessman, the housekeeper, the sportsman, nurses, doctors—everyone whose work or play takes him into the dark.

The Radiolite is a sturdy watch encased in nickel. The Radiolite 2-in-1 is the same watch in an attractive stand. For outdoor men and women, the Midwest Wrist Radiolite is the ideal timepiece; small and strongly built, it comes with pigskin strap. The Waterbury Radiolite is a handsome and durable jeweled watch. Encased in nickel and made in popular size. Look for the store with an Ingersoll display and remember—

"There's no Radiolite but the Ingersoll Radiolite."

The Secret of Making People Like You

"Getting people to like you is the quick road to success—it's more important than ability," says this man. It surely did wonders for him. How he does it—a simple method which anyone can use instantly.

ALL the office was talking about it, and we were wondering which one of us would be the lucky man.

There was an important job to be filled—as Assistant-to-the-President. According to the general run of salaries in the office, this one would easily pay from $7,000 to $10,000 a year.

The main requisite, as we understood it, was striking personality and the ability to meet even the biggest men in their offices, their clubs, and their homes on a basis of absolute equality. This the firm considered of even more importance than knowledge of the business.

You know just what happens when news of this sort gets around an office. The boys got to picking the man among themselves. They had the choice all narrowed down to two men—

Harrison and myself. That was the way I felt about it, too. Harrison was big enough for the job, and could undoubtedly make a success of it. But, personally, I felt that I had the edge on him in lots of ways. And I was sure that the firm knew it, too.

Never shall I forget my thrill of pleasure when the president's secretary came into my office with a cheery smile, looked at me meaningly, handed me a bulletin and said, "Mr. Frazer, here is the news about the new Assistant-to-the-President." There seemed to be a new note of added respect in her attitude toward me. I smiled my appreciation as she left my desk.

At last I had come into my own! Never did the sun shine so brightly as on that morning, and never did it seem so good to be alive! These were my thoughts as I gazed out of the window, seeing not the hurrying throngs, but vivid pictures of my new position flashing before me. And then for a further joyous thrill I read the bulletin. It said, "Effective January 1, Mr. Henry J. Peters, of our Cleveland office, will assume the duties of Assistant-to-the-President at the home office."

Peters! Peters!—surely it couldn't be Peters! Why, this fellow Peters was only a branch-office salesman. . . Personality! Why, he was only five feet four inches high, and had no more personality than a mouse. Stack him up against a big man and he'd look and act like an office boy. I knew Peters well and there was nothing to him, nothing at all.

January the first came and Peters assumed his new duties. All the boys were openly hostile to him. Naturally, I felt very keenly about it, and didn't exactly go out of my way to make things pleasant for him—not exactly!

But our open opposition didn't seem to bother Peters. He went right on with his work and began to make good. Soon I noticed that, despite my feelings against him, I was secretly beginning to admire him. He was winning over the other boys, too. It wasn't long before we all buried our little hatchets and palled up with Peters.

The funny thing about it was the big hit he made with the people we did business with. I never saw anything like it. They would come in and write in and telephone in to the firm and praise Peters to the skies. They insisted on doing business with him, and gave him orders of a size that made us dizzy to look at. And offers of positions!—why, Peters had almost as many fancy-figure positions offered to him as a dictionary has words.

What I could not get into my mind was how a little, unassuming, ordinary-to-look-at chap like Peters could make such an impression with everyone—especially with influential men. He seemed to have an uncanny influence over people. The masterly Peters of today was an altogether different man from the commonplace Peters I had first met years ago. I could not figure it out, nor could the other boys.

One day at luncheon I came right out and asked Peters how he did it. I half expected him to evade. But he didn't. He let me in on the secret. He said he was not afraid to do it as there was always plenty of room at the top.

What Peters told me acted on my mind in exactly the same way as when you stand on a hill and look through binocular glasses at objects in the far distance. Many things I could not see before suddenly leaped into my mind with startling clearness.

A new sense of power surged through me. And I felt the urge to put it into action.

Within a month I was getting remarkable results. I had suddenly become popular. Business men of importance who had formerly given me only a passing nod of acquaintance, suddenly showed a desire for my friendship. I was invited into the most select social circles. People—even strangers—actually went out of their way to do things for me. At first I was astounded at my new power over men and women. Not only could I get them to do what I wanted them to do, but they actually anticipated my wishes and seemed eager to please me. But let me tell you some of my experiences.

One of our biggest customers had a grievance against the firm. He held off payment of a big bill and switched to one of our competitors. I was sent to see him. He met me like a cornered tiger. A few words and I calmed him. Inside of fifteen minutes he was showering me with apologies. He gave me a check in full payment, another big order, and promised to continue giving us all his business.

For certain reasons it became necessary for the firm to obtain a signed letter from a prominent public man. Three of our men had tried, and failed. Then I was given the job. I felt I had been made the "goat." But I got the signed letter, and with it an inside tip which enabled us to land a prize order about which our competitors are still guessing and wondering.

Then trouble sprang up at one of our factories. The men talked strike. Things looked ugly. I was sent to straighten it out. On the eve of a general walkout, I pacified the men and headed off the strike. And not only this, but ever since then this factory has led all our other plants in production.

I could tell you dozens of similar instances, but they all tell the same story—the ability to make people like you, believe what you want them to believe, and to do what you want them to do. I take no personal credit for what I have done. All the credit I give to the method Peter told me about. We have told it to lots of our friends, and it has enabled them to do just as remarkable things as Peters and I have done.

Which reminds me: One of my wife's close friends moved to another town where she was a stranger. My wife of course knew of my method. She told it to her friend with the idea that it might be of assistance to her in meeting new people. It helped her so wonderfully that in a very short time she won the close friendship of many of the "best families" in the town. Every one wonders how she did it. But WE know.

But you want to know what method I used to do all these remarkable things. It is this: You know that every one doesn't think alike. What one likes another dislikes. What pleases one offends another. And what offends one pleases another. Well, there is your cue. You can make an instant hit with any one if you say the things they want you to say, and act the way they want you to act. Do this and they will surely like you, and believe in you, and will go miles out of their way to PLEASE YOU.

You can do this easily by knowing certain simple signs. Written on every man, woman and child are signs, as clearly and as distinctly as though they were in letters a foot high, which show you from one quick glance exactly what to say and to do to please them—to get them to believe what you want them to believe—to think as you think—to do exactly what you want them to do.

In knowing these simple signs is the whole secret of getting what you want out of life—of making friends, of business and social advancement. Every great leader uses this method. That is why he IS a leader. Use it yourself and you will quickly become a leader—nothing can stop you. And you will want to use it for no other reason than to protect yourself against others.

What Peters told me at luncheon that day was this: "Get Dr. Blackford's 'Reading Character at Sight.'" I did so. This is how I learned to do all the remarkable things I have told you about.

You have heard of Dr. Blackford, the Master Character Analyst. Many concerns will not employ a man without first getting Dr. Blackford to pass on him. Concerns such as Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company, Baker-Vawter Company, Scott Paper Company and many others pay Dr. Blackford large annual fees for advice on dealing with human nature.

So great was the demand for these services that Dr. Blackford could not even begin to fill all the engagements. So Dr. Blackford has explained the method in a simple seven-lesson course entitled "Reading Character at Sight." Even a half hour's reading of this remarkable course will give you an insight into human nature and a power over people which will surprise you.

Such confidence have the publishers in Dr. Blackford's course, "Reading Character at Sight," that they will gladly send it to you on approval. Send no money. Merely fill in and mail the coupon. The complete course will go to you instantly, on approval, all charges prepaid. Look it over thoroughly. See if it lives up to the claims made for it. If you do not want to keep it, then return it, and the transaction is closed. And if you decide to keep it—as you surely will—then merely remit Five Dollars in full payment.

Remember, you take no risk, you assume no obligation. The entire course goes to you on approval. You've everything to gain—nothing to lose. So mail the coupon NOW, while this remarkable offer remains open.

"People would come in and serve in and telephone in and advise Peters to the skies... he was showered with offers of fancy figure positions."

"In a very short time she won the close friendship of many of the 'best families' in town."

“My! How Valspar Varnish brightens that old linoleum!”

WHEREVER you have linoleum, congoeum or oilcloth in your home, varnish it with Valspar after it has been on the floor three or four months.

You will be delighted with the result! The Valspar will not only brighten it up, but will make it last a great deal longer because it will take much of the surface wear and absolutely prevent the penetration of moisture.

Valsparred linoleum can be washed with soap and warm water. In fact, even boiling water has no effect on Valspar.

Hot grease can spatter or spill on Valsparred kitchen linoleum without injuring the finish or soaking in.

Spilled liquids, such as vinegar, ammonia, and alcohol will not harm Valspar.

In halls and vestibules Valspar will protect linoleum against scuffing feet and dripping umbrellas.

Valspar is easy to apply and it dries over night.

Try it! Give your linoleum two coats of Valspar, allowing the first coat to harden at least a week before applying the second.

And beware of this: Don't be led into using any ordinary varnish on linoleum. You must have the washable, water-proof varnish that will not turn white—Valspar!

AUSTRIA BEFORE THE JUDGES

FEW events in history have the dramatic significance of the scene at St. Germain, France, on Monday of last week. True to the canons of all great tragedy, there were in that scene elements of comedy. It was as if some great playwright had conceived and written a drama into which he introduced elements of farce to heighten the tragic effect.

The actors in this scene were delegates from many nations. The central figures were Austrians, though no less conspicuous was the short gray man who is called by his countrymen Father Victory—Clemenceau, the embodiment of the indomitable spirit of France.

The Austrian delegates came as representatives of one of the little nations. When the Austrian Chancellor, Dr. Karl Renner, stood in that assembly, he spoke on behalf of some seven million people and addressed the representatives of several hundred million; and among the people to whose mercy he appealed were the Serbians.

Thus began the last act of the play on which the curtain first rose five years ago this month. Then the name Austria was commonly used to designate one of the most powerful and most arrogant empires in the world. It was Austria that found in the murder of the heir to her throne a pretext to crush her small neighbor Serbia; and, as if to increase the terror which her aggression had produced, she brought to bear upon those who would oppose her the military might of her powerful neighbor, the German Empire. Like many another criminal, she was the dupe of her own intrigue. Of course it was not Austria, but what is known as the Austro-Hungarian Empire, that was the instrument in precipitating the war; now there are but two fragments of that Empire left, the two nations that together held the rest in subjection—Austria and Hungary—and it was Austria that stood last week before her judges at St. Germain.

And yet there is something in Austria that saves her from the opprobrium and contempt directed against Germany. There is an element of suavity, of humanness, which has always distinguished the Austrians from their northern German cousins, and has made them, even when arrogant and intriguing, likable. Austria has played the part of bandit more than once, but she has not been a thug, like Prussia.

The very manner in which the Austrians appeared before the other delegates at St. Germain was characteristically in contrast to the way in which the Prussians and their heelers from the other German states appeared at Versailles. Both the Germans and the Austrians were received by their captors standing; and when they were addressed the presiding officer of the Conference, the spokesman, stood. It was characteristic of the Germans that when Count Brockdorff-Rantzau replied he remained seated, while the Austrian spokesman, Dr. Renner, stood as Monsieur Clemenceau had done. A little thing, but a sure indicator of the difference between the German and the Austrian.

The comedy elements were supplied by a photographer who fell from his stand, shattering the glass in one of the museum cases, and by the translator, who made some forgivable slips which created amusement and relieved the tension.

THE AUSTRIAN TERMS AND THE RHINELAND

In many respects the terms which the Allied and Associated Powers presented to Austria were virtually identical with those presented to Germany. For instance, the article of those terms embodying the Covenant of the League of Nations is unchanged, and such clauses as those which refer to territories outside Europe, to penalties for the violation of the laws and customs of war, etc., and to freedom of transit are the same in the Austrian as in the German treaty except for such obvious modifications as change in name and in certain particulars that clearly apply to only one of the nations. By this treaty Austria is reduced to what may well be considered her lowest terms. Territorially she is now one of the smallest of the countries in southern Europe. She ceases to have any seacoast, and becomes, like Switzerland and Czechoslovakia, a purely inland state. What will become of Vienna, which has been one of the centers of European civilization, is a question to which there is no answer that is very hopeful.

According to the terms of the German treaty Austria will not be permitted to unite with the German Empire except by consent of the League of Nations. As we understand it, that means that such a union would have to have the unanimous approval of the Council, in which France will be represented. It is most improbable that France will ever consent to the union of Austria with the other German states. If this provision is retained and observed, the world will be saved from one of the perils which at times seem very near and which not even the defeat of Germany removed. There has been the chance that a sentimentalism disguised as liberalism, combined with the natural desire to collect all possible damages from Germany, might induce the Powers to permit Germany to come out of the war strengthened by the addition of Austria. It seems as if it were obvious that the interest of Europe lay not in strengthening but in reducing the power which the Germans have so persistently misused. Fortunately, the union of Austria with Germany seems to be prevented.

And now comes news that may indicate dissolution within the German Empire. Last week there was proclaimed the establishment of the autonomous Rhenish Republic, composed of the Rhenish Province, Old Nassau, Rhenish Hesse, and the Palatinate, with its capital at Coblenz. It is announced that this new state is "founded in the bosom of Germany." Whether it will remain in the bosom of Germany, whether it will continue at all, it is a sign of the natural tendencies of the German people. The Rhenish Republic is anti-Prussian. There is reason to believe that if artificial pressure from outside were removed, and if the nations of the world decided to deal with Bavaria, for example, directly rather than through her mistress Prussia, Bavaria would welcome the release. It is said that the disintegration of Germany into its component parts would be a catastrophe for Europe and for the rest of the world; but that argument rests upon the assumption that the rest of the world wants from Germany chiefly, if not only, indemnity and reparation. Really what the world needs from Germany is a new spirit. It wants a revival of the spirit that had a chance for expression before the repressive and stifling power of Prussia was exerted to bind these German states into an aggressive and materialistic empire. If the Rhenish Republic is a sign of disintegration, the civilized peoples of the world can very well reconcile themselves to the prospect.

THE MEXICAN REVOLUTIONISTS

Armed resistance to Carranza continues in both the northern and southern parts of Mexico, led by Felix Diaz in the south and by Villa in the north. Villa is said to be at the head of some thirteen thousand men in the State of Chihuahua, and may move against the towns of Torreon, Chihuahua, and Juarez, or any one of them. Despatches, as we write, say that an attack on Chihuahua is imminent.

Comparative political respectability has been lent to the Villa bandits by the leadership of General Felipe Angeles, whom Villa has proclaimed Provisional President. Angeles has been considered a man of ability and moderation. He has issued a document denouncing the present Constitution and promising to maintain law and order and to protect foreigners in their rights.

That protection is needed is shown by such an incident as that lately reported by an American engineer, Mr. F. B. Harding, whose mine was attacked by Villa bandits. He was beaten and abused and forced to march barefoot for over two hundred miles before he could reach a safe refuge.

Our Government will certainly not recognize Angeles in any way. Nor will it aid Carranza; indeed, it has just refused to allow Carranza to move troops through Texas in order to get at Villa, on the ground that if this were done the removal of the troops would leave our border towns exposed to attack from bandits in what is now Carranza territory.

Three years of Carranza's rule have not made Mexico safe for foreigners nor removed the constant threat of danger for American towns. As the election of a new President comes nearer, the prospect of quietude and peace is far from satisfactory.

CLASS WARFARE BY BOMB

In a handbill or circular found in the vicinity of three of the atrocious bomb explosions of last week the declaration is made that "Class war is on. . . . The proletariat has the . . . right to protect itself. Since their press has been suffocated, their mouths muzzled, we mean to speak for them, the voice of dynamite, through the mouth of guns." If this handbill, entitled "Plain Words," was the platform of the assassins who wrecked, or tried to wreck, homes in eight cities within twenty-four hours, their murderous acts indicate a concerted plot to make war upon the guardians of law and order. That these attacks in eight cities, reported on June 3, should have taken place simultaneously by mere chance would be a coincidence altogether unbelievable.

It is the positive and all-important duty of Federal, State, and municipal authorities, therefore, to search for the roots of the conspiracy; to find out, not merely what hands executed these crimes, but what leaders taught followers that, to quote the leaflet again, "We will kill, because it is necessary," and that the dynamiting of innocent people is righteous class warfare.

There is a similarity between these bomb outrages and those which were attempted by mail several weeks ago. In both cases the men whose lives were attacked have incurred the hatred of Anarchists because of judicial or other public acts alleged by the Anarchists to have been injurious to the proletariat. As a matter of fact, what Attorney-General Palmer and Judge Charles C. Nott, for instance, stand for is public order, fair dealing, and the lawful suppression and prevention of crime.

It is too close to the commission of these crimes as we write to know completely all the facts. The reports indicate that one man, probably a watchman, was killed outside of Judge Nott's house in East Sixty-first Street, New York, while in front of Attorney-General Palmer's house in Washington a man was blown to pieces who is supposed to be the dynamiter who planted the bomb. It is astonishing, in view of the terrible explosive power of the bombs (or perhaps sticks of dynamite) used, that the fatalities were so few. In addition to these two crimes there came almost simultaneously reports of the dynamiting of several residences in Pittsburgh, including that of Judge W. H. S. Thompson, of the United States District Court, while similar attacks were made on the home of Mayor H. L. Davis, of Cleveland; of Judge A. E. Hayden, of Boston; of Max Gold, a silk manufacturer of Paterson, New Jersey; and on one or two buildings in Philadelphia.

It is probably useless to call attention to the fact that such outrages as these indicate loose methods of selling explosives. That has been done over and over again, but it seems to be the easiest thing in the world for an Anarchist to buy dynamite. No doubt all the resources of the Government will be employed to trace out the perpetrators of these dastardly crimes. Whether these efforts succeed or not, there must be at least equal effort to prevent the teaching of murder and the promulgation of the insane dogma that the way to liberty lies through class war.

FROM ROCKAWAY TO PLYMOUTH

When the American seaplane the NC-4 smoothly dropped to the water of Plymouth Sound on May 31, she completed a memorable journey, and one marking an epoch in the history of the conquest of the air. Under Lieutenant-Commander Read's direction, and as part of a planned and carefully thought out undertaking by our Navy, the NC-4 had traveled in all from Rockaway to Plymouth a distance of 3,925 nautical miles, or over 4,500 geographical miles. The actual flying time for the whole distance (adding together, of course, the different times made in the different stages) was a little over fifty-seven hours, and the average speed was a little over sixty-eight nautical miles an hour. It is interesting to note also, as bearing on future transatlantic flights, that the distance from Newfoundland to Portugal, which might be called the transatlantic flight proper, was 2,150 nautical miles, and that the average speed for this main part of the voyage was a little over eighty nautical miles an hour.

The welcome accorded the NC-4 when she thus reached England was cordial and enthusiastic. Both the naval authorities and the people of Great Britain received the American aviators with every token of appreciation and with hearty praise for the first accomplishing of the Atlantic passage by air. The English press was united in recognizing the importance of the American success and in regretting, but without carping or belittling, that English aviators had not scored the victory.

Among the first to welcome the Americans when they reached London was Harry Hawker, the bold airman who so narrowly escaped death in his attempt to cross the Atlantic under power of a single engine. No one can doubt his sincere recognition of the great feat accomplished by the Americans. He was evidently anxious also to show that he had been misunderstood, or possibly misreported, in his comments at a luncheon given in his honor in London. By a reporter he was interpreted as discounting the American transatlantic flight by saying, "If you put a ship every fifty miles, it shows you have no fight in your motor." Mr. Hawker has since declared that in saying this he did not have in mind any criticism of the American Navy's arrangements. What he meant to convey evidently was the idea that he did not sympathize with the criticism that had been directed against the British Government for failing to place a line of steamship sentinels along his line of flight, as the American Navy had done for the American naval seaplanes; for if he had consented to such an arrangement it would have indicated that he did not have the faith in his motor that he professed. The difference in the nature of the two attempts accounts for the difference in the arrangements. The American attempt was official. The men who piloted the machines were under orders; the men who made the arrangements were responsible for providing for every practicable safeguard for the lives of the flight officers and their crews. The attempt by Mr. Hawker and Lieutenant Grieve was a private venture, in which the men who made the arrangements took the risks themselves. The American fliers could not have refused the ship sentinels even had they chosen to do so. It need not be pointed out that the American Navy was not engaged in a competitive adventure, but was seriously performing a naval duty which had in view, not merely the crossing of the ocean, but the gaining of scientific knowledge to be of avail in the development and expansion of the art of aviation, and in particular the capability and management of seaplanes.

ROBERT BACON

Financier, diplomat, soldier, and patriot, Robert Bacon, who died on May 29, was a man of the finest American type. General Pershing, on whose staff Lieutenant-Colonel Bacon served in France, has said that through his death "the country loses a great soul and his friends an intimate and loyal companion." His actual war service was recognized by the Distinguished Service Medal and the French Croix de Guerre. But probably of even greater value than his military activity was the influence he exercised before America entered the war in urging preparation and military training and in advocating a bold and firm stand against German aggression. As President of the National Security League and in connection with the Army League and Navy League he was foremost in leading the way toward the assertion of the country's dignity and valor.

Few men have been so fully successful and useful in varied fields of public work. He was an overseer and a fellow at Harvard, where he was graduated in the class with Theodore Roosevelt, whose friendship for him continued strong and fine for thirty-eight years thereafter. As a banker and financier he took part in many great economic undertakings, such as the organization of the United States Steel Corporation. As diplomat his career culminated when President Taft in 1909 sent him as Ambassador to France after he had been Assistant Secretary of State and, for a brief time, Secretary of State. Always he was a force in whatever field he worked, a courteous and considerate gentleman in manner, vigorous and persistent in action, invariably clear-headed and unfaltering in his devotion to the interests of his country.

A VILLAIN UNHANGED

It is ardently to be hoped that the recent despatch reporting the capture of Enver Pasha in some remote corner of Trans-Caucasia is true. With the exception of his accomplice Talaat Pasha, no greater scoundrel ever lived unhanged. He was the real head of the Turkish government which, with unconscious irony, called itself for a time the Committee of Union and Progress. The control was in the hands of Enver, Talaat, and Djimal. Together they were responsible for the massacre of perhaps a million Armenians, Syrians, and Greeks. Enver was the brains of the crime; the others were the brutal directors of its execution. The three wholesale murderers have been denounced by the present Sultan and he has hanged one of their accomplices. If Enver is not tried and executed by the now cringing Turkish Government, he should be dealt with by the Allies. Mr. Morgenthau describes Enver thus: "His nature had a remorselessness, a lack of pity, a cold-blooded determination, of which his clean-cut, handsome face, his small but sturdy figure, and his pleasing manners gave no indication."

Enver and his accomplices betrayed their country into the hands of the Germans. Enver, in particular, simply drove the Turks to war without authority to act for them. When defeat and disgrace came, Enver and Talaat fled, after first robbing the treasury of many millions of dollars. They were mean scoundrels as well as murderers on a colossal scale.

ALL QUIET ON THE QUINNIPIAC

What might have been a serious riot was averted in New Haven the other day by good municipal management, by equally sensible conduct on the part of the Yale Faculty, and by the moral restraint of most citizens and students. When we read in the headlines that troops had been called out to curb riots, that insults had been offered by students to soldiers, that "collegians challenge soldiers just back from France to battle," we knew that there were mistake and misrepresentation afloat.

So it proved. Yale sent eight thousand men to the war. She had men in the parade of the 102d Regiment, the parade of which had led to the misunderstanding. Yale is loyal and patriotic. She is also enthusiastic—and some of her enthusiasm was mistaken by an equally patriotic but thick-headed mob element for insult. Interchange of greetings between friends in the ranks and on the campus became noisy; "joshing" may have been taken for jeering; the undergraduate sense of humor is peculiar, and a street mob has no sense of humor. Evil and bad-tempered reports stirred up excitement and ill will. Perhaps a little of ancient "town and gown" feud spirit exists. For a time things looked badly, but the closing up of the college gates, a little cold water from fire hose, a season of reasonable explanation, and the little war was over.

The moral seems to be: Don't fight until you know what you are fighting about; and don't be foolish enough to believe rumors without evidence—even if they get into sensational newspapers.

A RECONSTRUCTION SUMMER AT SMITH COLLEGE

The Smith College Training School for Social Work is a graduate professional school, offering work that falls into three divisions: a summer session of eight weeks of theoretical instruction combined with clinical observation; a training period of nine months' practical instruction carried on in co-operation with hospitals and settlements; and a concluding summer session of eight weeks of advanced study.

Last year The Outlook reported the plan for training in the rehabilitation of sufferers from shell shock which Smith College adopted at the request of the National Committee for Mental Hygiene. It consisted of an intensive course in psychiatric social work, and its success may be judged by the fact that every one of the forty-six graduates has immediately upon her graduation secured a position in her chosen field. But Smith College is going to do more this year than repeat this course. The urgency of many other lines of social work has suddenly become so strong that a general demand has been created for trained workers in certain special fields.

In addition to psychiatric social work, there are courses in medical social work, community service, and child welfare work. After two months of study, students in all but the latter course, which is completed in one summer session, will go to various hospitals, clinics, settlements, and social agencies in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore for nine months' supervised field work, to be followed by a second summer session in Northampton. The emphasis on psychology and on the scientific approach to social problems is a distinctive feature of the new school. Its founders believe also that discussion is a better medium than lectures for dealing with vital social issues.

This year Dr. E. E. Southard and Dr. Walter E. Fernald will again act on the advisory committee for the psychiatric course, and Miss Mary C. Jarrett will direct the course and act as associate to the Director, Dr. F. Stuart Chapin, of Smith College. Dr. Richard C. Cabot will be chairman; Miss Ida M. Cannon a member of the advisory committee; and Miss Anne P. Hincks and Mrs. Ada E. Sheffield will serve on the committee for child welfare. Miss Grace T. Wills, associate director of Lincoln House, will supervise the course in community service. With them are associated Dr.

Catherine Brannick, of the South Framingham Reformatory, Dr. Edith R. Spaulding, late psychopathic director of Bedford Reformatory, Miss M. Antoinette Cannon, chief of social service at the University Hospital of Philadelphia, and Miss Carrie A. Gauthier, of the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

Altogether the school offers exceptional opportunities to college graduates and women of equivalent preparation, to whom full courses are open, and to social workers and teachers who may under certain conditions be admitted to the summer sessions.

AN EDUCATIONAL TOUR OF OUR NATIONAL FORESTS AND PARKS

The Massachusetts Forestry Association will repeat this year its effort in 1917 to make known to Eastern people the public parks and forests of the West. From its first excursion of this kind the Association's guests came back with enlarged ideas and pleasant memories of a notable tour. The work is strictly of an educational character, the Forestry Association making no profit whatever on the expedition.

To those who have never seen the Great West the tour offers the most alluring kind of a vacation. Starting from Boston on June 26, the trip will include a visit to Estes Park, in Colorado, after a halt at Denver—or, as an alternative, a journey by automobile through the heart of the Pike National Forest to the summit of Pike's Peak; then a week in the Yellowstone National Park—the first of our great public parks to be opened—which will be traversed by the new automobile service that has taken the place of the old-fashioned stages; this is to be followed by a week in one of the most recently opened of our public recreation grounds, Glacier National Park, in Montana, in which is to be found probably the wildest scenery of any of our parks, and in which the use of the saddle-horse is still an agreeable necessity in climbing the mountain trails; then comes a visit to Seattle, Puget Sound, and Rainier National Park and Forest—a trip that, if the season chances to be backward, may require the giving up of automobiles and the use of sledges for a part of the distance; a glimpse of Portland and of the Columbia River Highway follows; two days are then to be spent in seeing Crater Lake National Park and Forest, with a view of the logging operations at Klamath Lake. San Francisco, the next point on the itinerary, is seen en route to the Yosemite National Park and the Sierra National Forest, this section of the tour also including a visit to the giant sequoias of Mariposa Grove. Los Angeles, San Diego, Riverside, Mount Roubidoux—the names suggest delightful memories to those who know these places, and delightful anticipations to those who are to see them for the first time on this tour.

This comprehensive trip will conclude with a visit to the Grand Canyon National Park, which became such (instead of a National Monument) on February 26 of this year; while an extension trip through the Tusayan and Coconino National Forests will be afforded, with an opportunity to visit the cliff dwellings of the past and the Indian pueblos of to-day.

The tour will occupy nearly two months and its cost will be about seven hundred dollars for each person, but to those who can afford the time and money exceptional value is offered. The primary purpose of the tour is to foster public knowledge of our great parks and forests, and to promote a public spirit that will help their conservation and development. Almost every session of Congress is confronted with some suggestion of change or alteration in these public domains, and the more friends the parks and forests have the less likelihood will there be of any harmful encroachment on these picturesque areas of public land. The Massachusetts Forestry Association is to be commended for this endeavor to widen the circle of intelligent friends of our great public park and forest systems.

THE BAPTISTS AND CHURCH UNION

At the meeting of the Northern Baptist Convention at Denver, May 21-28, the Baptists of the North expressed themselves unequivocally as averse to organic union, while at the same session voting to unite in the Interchurch World Movement to co-operate with other denominations in common Christian tasks. To the invitation extended by the Presbyterian General Assembly to send delegates to a Council looking toward organic union of the Protestant denominations the Convention adopted unanimously a formal reply courteously declining to send delegates, and expressing the belief that organic union is impossible. The reply pointed out that the Baptist denomination is a collection of independent democratic churches, and that there is no centralized body that exercises any control over any one of them, or that is capable of delivering them to any merger or corporate unity. "If Baptist churches do not have organic unity among themselves, they obviously cannot have organic unity with other denominations." "We are convinced," the reply declares, "that our fundamental conception of the church, the nature of our organization, the democracy which is the very basis of our denominational life, make any organic union with groups of Christians holding opposite views unwise and impossible."

The statement is of interest also as forecasting the attitude of Baptists toward the proposals of the Episcopal and Anglican Churches of unity on the basis of the acceptance of Episcopal orders. Baptists believe in "the complete competence of the individual to come directly into saving relationship with God." To them a church is a local community of believers, and the only Church Universal is a spiritual fellowship of souls thus related to God. All sacerdotalism and sacramentarianism is thus denied, and all ecclesiastical orders rejected, since all believers are on a spiritual equality and all Christians equally priests of the Most High. Ordination is only a formal recognition on the part of some local church that one of its members is judged worthy to serve as pastor.

Baptists nevertheless find no inconsistency in entering heartily into federal and co-operative relations with other bodies of Christians, as in the Interchurch World Movement. The Convention, however, imposed certain conditions upon its co-operation, reserving the right to appoint its own representatives in the Movement, to present its own budget to its own constituency and raise its own funds, and to administer its own programme of expansion, and it prescribed that evangelical denominational bodies only should be included.

Together with this reassertion of the independence of the local church, the denomination at Denver established, for the first time in its history, a truly representative and National executive board, to be known as the Board of Promotion, to which a larger degree of authority is committed than Baptists hitherto have been accustomed to. A broad survey of Baptist tasks and responsibilities, arising from the present world situation, carefully prepared by a committee that has been long at work, was presented to the Convention and adopted by it, calling for an expenditure within five years of $100,000,000; and for the raising and expending of this amount, and for the widening work of the denomination at home and abroad, the organization of such a board of representatives of every State and each missionary, educational, and benevolent organization within the denomination seemed obviously necessary. Thus the democracy of Baptists is seeking that integration and superintendence that spells efficiency.

The six-million-dollar Victory Fund which Baptists have been raising within the last few months was reported to be within $500,000 of success, and a gift of $2,000,000 endowment from John D. Rockefeller for home and foreign mis-

TRAINED NURSES AND RECONSTRUCTION

Public health nursing, which promises to become one of the great social forces of reconstruction in the future, was first organized in the large cities, notably New York, Chicago, Providence, and Boston, perhaps forty years ago. Smaller towns, and especially rural communities, however, have not shared in this development, and the Red Cross Department of Nursing is now particularly desirous of placing public health nurses in these localities.

The public health nurse, with her general and post-graduate training, is now recognized as the most efficient instrument for promoting a high order of community health. Her duties are of the most direct and practical form of social service. Striking at the root of epidemics by teaching prevention of the spread of contagion, she organizes classes of women who study the first principles of household sanitation, home nursing, and home dietetics.

A neighborhood nurse also inspects school children, separating the sick from the well and discovering faults of development, such as defective eyesight, "bad tonsils," and "fallen arches." That such inspection is also greatly needed is evident by the six hundred thousand men rejected in the recent army draft for preventable physical disqualifications. She gives instructions to expectant mothers so that the yearly death rate of fifteen thousand women from childbirth alone may be reduced and the child be given more than a possible five chances out of seven to live. She is also the constant enemy of tuberculosis and other communicable diseases.

The Red Cross hopes to offer instruction in home hygiene and care of the sick to every woman and girl in the United States. In urban communities, Red Cross Teaching Centers have already been established, where the course is offered to factory operatives, girl scouts, nursemaids, "little mothers," and other specialized groups as well as to women who wish certificates for completion of the standardized course.

In working out this programme, perhaps the greatest obstacle which confronts the Red Cross is the lack of available public health nursing personnel. At the beginning of the war there were approximately six thousand public health nurses in the United States. Some of these, however, have since entered military service. The Red Cross has therefore appropriated one hundred thousand dollars in Public Health Scholarship Funds, with an additional five thousand dollars Loan Fund, to prepare nurses for public health work, and hopes to interest many of the twenty thousand nurses now being released in large numbers from the Army and Navy Nurse Corps to take post-graduate training for public health nursing. As an initial effort to launch this educational programme, the Department of Nursing is assigning Red Cross nurses on the various Chautauqua Circuits covering the length and breadth of the country during the summer of 1919—veterans of the great base hospitals behind the lines of Château Thierry and the Argonne, who shall become "wandering troubadors of health."

THE KAISER AND THE LAW

DISTURBING reports come from Paris that the influence of the American delegation there is in effect pro-German. It is said that the American delegates are inclined to agree with the German contention that the Allies have no right to demand the surrender and trial of the Kaiser and the rest of the gang that brought on the war. These reports are unfortunately credible.

Somebody has said, very pertinently, that a good many of the Americans connected with the Commission to Negotiate Peace act and speak as if the war had been fought on paper. At the Crillon, where our commissioners and their experts have been indefatigably and usefully busy, there is a very large element of the academic mind. In any group that element is a very desirable ingredient except when it becomes disproportionately large. We have seen what the academic mind can do when it gets hypnotized by militarism. It can be equally dangerous when it becomes hypnotized by any other theory. There is a body of doctrine that seems to fascinate men who see life chiefly through books. In this body of doctrine are such beliefs, quite contrary to normal human experience, as that it is possible to have peace without victory; that forgiveness is always a virtue; and that, whereas it is permissible for mobs to fight, for individuals, if they are poor enough and degraded enough, to assassinate, and for a down-trodden class to make war, it is an inexcusable offense against humanity for a nation to fight, even for liberty, particularly if it does so in an orderly and efficient way.

Now one of the beliefs that seem to have seized upon a certain kind of academic mind is that a crime is not a crime if you call it political. If a man commits a gross libel and injures the reputation of another without cause, he is not to be treated as a criminal, according to this academic doctrine, if he committed his crime in order to secure a political advantage. One of the most despicable crimes of this sort was committed a few years ago; the perpetrator fled to this country, and was seized for deportation. Whereupon from some of those who are academically disposed there rose a loud outcry because the man's victim happened to be a ruler. Now the same kind of belief applies to the case of the Kaiser and his gang. It is said that, although they committed crimes, including rape, cold-blooded murder, torture, and what is even worse, the attempted and in part successful assassination of a people's soul (for qui facit per alium facit per se), they did it all for a political purpose and in the capacity of political leaders, and therefore they cannot be touched and ought not to be punished or even tried.

Of course this is equivalent to adopting, perhaps unconsciously, the German view. That view is that the state can do no wrong; that the ruler of a people is above the law, not only of his own land, not only of other lands, but also above international law, and even the moral law. The Germans said there was no international law, no public law of nations. They proceeded to act upon what they asserted to be the fact. The Germans were not fighting for autocracy; they were fighting for the same reason that a criminal fights. They wanted booty, and they professed to believe that they were doing only what everybody else would do in their place. That is what the pickpocket believes. The reason why the world rose up against the Germans is that the German belief offends the instincts and conscience of mankind.

The nations of the world fought against Germany and her partners in crime because the nations of the world believe that there is such a thing as international law, that there is a public law of nations, both written and unwritten, and that men and states who willfully violate it can and should be held accountable.

POPULAR FALLACIES

I—THAT WHAT'S MINE'S MY OWN

WHY is it yours?

Because I made it.

Any one help you?

No! I made it myself.

Is that true? Can it be true of anything? Does any man ever make anything without any help?

An author writes an article for The Outlook. All the machinery he needs is a pen, a bottle of ink, and some writing paper. It is apparently wholly the product of his labor.

But can it be said, No one helped him? He could not write it without paper on which to write. Did you ever go into a paper mill? Did you ever trace the history of the linen rag from its entrance into the mill at one end to its issue from the mill as a clean white sheet of writing paper at the other? How many processes does it have to go through, how many men and women take a part in these processes, before the author can have the sheet of paper on which to write his article? They are all co-laborers with him in its preparation.

But not only is it necessary to prepare his paper and pens and ink; it is necessary to prepare him. His ideas are transformed into words through his brain and put upon paper by his hand, and others have helped him prepare the brain and fit the hand for their tasks. Last night he was tired out and could not have written. A good night's sleep and a good breakfast have set him up, and now his pen flies as fast as his fingers can drive it. How much of the vigor, the wit, the wise judgment of his contribution is due to that night's sleep and that good breakfast? Who can tell how much of the piety in the minister's sermon and the caustic humor in the editor's article are due to the cook, and how much to the preacher and the writer?

Nor is his indebtedness only to the contemporaries who have equipped his brain with new power to perform its new task. Unnumbered men and women have contributed to the store from which he is drawing as he writes. Dr. Lyman Beecher once sat in the pew and heard a young and dishonest minister preach a sermon which Dr. Beecher himself had preached elsewhere a few months before. After the sermon Dr. Beecher went up to the thief and asked him, "How long did it take you to prepare that sermon?" "Oh, about a week," was the reply. "Indeed!" said Dr. Beecher; "it took me forty years." Into our contributions go the experiences, the observations, the reading, the studies of a lifetime. Paul and Plato, David and Dante, Beecher and Brooks, are a few of the philosophers, the poets, the preachers who have been bringing to the minister the stores of material on which he draws for his sermon, and to the author on which he draws for his article. He could no more trace the sources from which he has derived his inspiration than he could trace the water he drinks to its original source in the clouds which bestowed it on the mountains.

Moreover, the article when it is written has no economic value if it is only written. The writer of this Essay on Fallacies has only succeeded in spoiling some sheets of clean white paper unless some other person will co-operate with him in giving to it a value. In fact, it will first go to the typewriter to be made into a typewritten copy; then to the composing-room to be set up in type; then to the pressroom to be printed; then to the mailing-room to be prepared for the mail; and then to the post office to be carried by railway or steamboat or carriage to readers all over the country.

Half a century ago a then famous minister in New York preached three sermons on the fifteenth chapter of St. Luke, and gave them to a publisher to be printed under the title of "The Lost Coin, the Lost Sheep, the Lost Son." The book was sent to The Outlook for notice, and a conscientious and sympathetic writer wrote a commendatory review. But his handwriting was obscure and the compositor was not familiar with the Bible and of course never saw the book, and the notice came out in the columns of the paper under the title of "The Lost Cow, the Lost Sheep, the Lost Sow." Unwittingly the compositor had turned the review, if not the book itself, into a joke. So true is it that upon the intelligent co-operation of the compositor depends the real value of the article which the author proudly calls his own.

Whether we like it or not, we are all members of a joint stock company. Society is a great factory in which each workman does his little part in making the completed product. "Economic independence" is nothing but a phrase; it represents no reality. No one is independent. The present generation inherits its materials and its tools from past generations whom it cannot repay, and bequeaths materials and tools to future generations from whom it can never receive pay. Money is what the political economists call it, a "medium of exchange." Dollars are simply counters which we use to facilitate the exchanging of services.

And the payments we make are very inadequately adjusted to the value of the services rendered to us.

Probably the most valued service is that of the doctor, for he keeps us alive. Next are the services of the teachers and the ministers, for they make us worth keeping alive; and the teachers and the ministers are the poorest paid of all the professions. We habitually pay little sums for great services and great sums for little services and sometimes for none at all. The best books are rarely the best sellers; the Bible is the one exception that proves the rule. We pay four hundred dollars to an artist who has painted the picture, and, after he dies, four thousand dollars to the dealer who happens to possess it.

Neither making nor buying gives us, according to a standard of absolute justice, a perfect title to property. Such title as we possess is given to us by the laws and the customs of society.

This fact is amply illustrated. Society recognizes your right to a horse, but not to a bear, for wild beasts are not subjects of personal property. At least they were not in Blackstone's day. If the circus, the menagerie, and the zoölogical garden have changed the law, that fact would still further emphasize the truth that social custom, not individual production, gives ownership. If a man builds a house, he and his heirs own it as long as it lasts. If an author writes a book, his ownership lasts twenty-eight years, and is renewable for fourteen years more. In most communities the owner of land owns it to the center of the earth; but in mining communities he owns it only a few feet down. Under a limited depth prescribed by law it may belong to a mining corporation; and the law regulating the ownership of rival corporations is so complicated that only an expert mining lawyer can understand it, and he not very well. In England and America a man at death may leave his property as he chooses, with certain exceptions in favor of his wife. But in France he cannot unqualifiedly disinherit his children.

The sum of the whole matter is this: Life is not designed for individual acquisition, but for mutuality of service. Society has always, in a blind and opportunist fashion, recognized this truth, and from time to time has altered its customs and its laws in order to promote an approximately just and equitable exchange of services.

LYMAN ABBOTT.

A NOVELIST'S NOVELIST

WALT WHITMAN has been called the poet's poet. With better reason Leonard Merrick may be called the novelist's novelist. A new edition of his novels, thirteen in number, has been called for by the spontaneous and concurrent action of thirteen of his contemporaries, modern novelists and dramatists, many of whom are better known to the novel-reading public than Mr. Merrick. These thirteen authors combine in introducing one whom Sir James Barrie, speaking for them, calls "our man." "There have been," says Barrie in his introduction to "Conrad in Quest of His Youth," "many 'authors' editions," but never, so far as I know, one quite like this, in which the 'author' is not the writer himself, but his contemporaries, who have entirely engineered the edition themselves and have fallen over each other, so to speak, in their desire to join in the honor of writing the prefaces."

Among these contemporaries who have thus combined in this quite unique testimonial of regard for the writer and affection for the man are such popular authors as Sir J. M. Barrie, H. G. Wells, W. J. Locke, and W. D. Howells, and such dramatists as Sir Arthur Pinero and J. K. Prothero. We make no attempt here to give any characterization of Merrick's qualities as an author of fiction; that must come later, when more of the volumes have been issued from the press; and though we are sorely tempted to quote at length from Mr. Barrie's charmingly keen analysis of the merits of his favorite, we must content ourselves with a single sentence: "There is no one with a greater art of telling a story, if that art consists in making us forever wonder what we are to find on the next page."

We do not recall any event in the history of literature quite like this edition, in which better, or at least more widely known, authors have combined in introducing to public favor one of their own competitors. It indicates that in the Republic of Letters there is an absence of that jealousy which gossip attributes to the two great interpreters of letters, actors and singers.

THE BRITISH BUDGET

HOW GREAT BRITAIN WATCHES HER EXPENSES

BY P. W. WILSON

Mr. P. W. Wilson is American correspondent of the "London Daily News," and was a member of the British Parliament from 1905 to 1910. For twelve years he was Parliamentary Correspondent for his paper, and he has heard twelve budgets introduced in the House of Commons. During the great struggle over Mr. Lloyd George's Budget of 1909 Mr. Wilson was in almost daily contact with the present British Prime Minister.—THE EDITORS.

BY consulting Whitaker's Almanac any Englishman can tell you in five minutes precisely what his country receives by taxes, and pays away on expenditure, and owes in national debt. The war has complicated matters, but even to-day the system stands good. In the United States I confess that I have not found it so easy to arrive at the corresponding figures.

Let me explain the British system. The financial year begins on April 1, ending the following March 31. Each of such years is made complete in itself. One year is not allowed, as it were, to overflow into another year.

In the autumn every department prepares an estimate of what it would like to spend in the following financial year. These estimates are laid before the Cabinet, and are approved with or without amendment. Over the cost of the Navy, for instance, there has often been a severe struggle at Downing Street.

When Parliament meets in January or February, the printed estimates are handed to members. They are then public property, and by adding up the totals any one can discover what the nation is likely to spend. The Chancellor of the Exchequer assumes that these estimates represent the expenditure which he will have to meet. Here and there the House of Commons may alter a figure, or there may be a supplementary estimate presented later in the year, but substantially the situation is defined. There is this further safeguard, that no private member can propose expenditure except through the Government. Here, as elsewhere, I am avoiding technical language and confining myself to the actual effect of the standing orders. What the House wishes to avoid is the danger of some irresponsible member forcing a vote on an item which might be very popular but none the less extravagant.

A certain number of days are given to discussing estimates, or, more accurately, the subjects which arise thereupon. For instance, in voting the salary of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, the House would probably debate the personality of "President" de Valera. It is only in form that the proceedings are financial, and most votes are carried by closure, without any discussion at all. When carried, they are gathered together into one appropriation bill, which cannot be amended, and this bill when passed authorizes the money to be paid out. For reasons of convenience there may be two or three such appropriation bills in the year, but they all fall within the above general scheme.

So much for expenditure—how about revenue? This is arranged by one department, namely, the Treasury, over which the Chancellor of the Exchequer presides. Let me repeat that the financial year begins on April 1. On that date the Chancellor knows exactly what money he has received from all sources in the previous twelve months, and on March 31 the account is cut as if by a knife. Every penny received on April 1 is reckoned in the new year.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer surveys his taxes and other sources of income, like the post office or the Suez Canal shares. He says to himself, "I have just received so much money from these sources. My advisers tell me that in the next twelve months, if I leave things exactly as they are, I shall receive a different sum." It may be more, it may be less, but in either event it is compared with the probable expenditure. Every Chancellor is expected to provide enough money in time of peace to cover what he expects to spend, with the addition of a small margin for safety.

If his taxes are sufficient to do this, he need not put on more. But he may take off a tax, if it is safe so to do, or he may reduce a tax and substitute another tax; but, whatever detailed proposals he makes for altering taxes, he must present a scheme which, taken as a whole, furnishes the revenue required.

Like the estimates, the budget is discussed and incorporated into a bill which, when carried, authorizes the collection of revenue. The bill may not receive the royal assent until August, but it is an established principle that revenue may be collected in advance on the basis of the estimated tax when first proposed. In other words, the actual statute is retrospective to that extent.

At the end of the year the Chancellor may find that he has made a miscalculation. Either he has in hand a surplus or there is a deficit. In times of peace such realized deficits have been almost unknown in British finance, but if they occur they are met out of balances and cleared up by the following year's revenue.

A surplus, however, is handed at once to the commissioners who deal with national debt and is used as repayment. This plan must be pursued unless the House by special legislation provides otherwise. Such repayment of debt would be additional to the regular sinking fund already provided for in the previous budget.

The House appreciates the fact that it cannot as a body scrutinize individual items of expenditure with a view to economy. A committee for this purpose is therefore established, and this committee issues a report, but only after the money is spent. It is a safeguard against gross misuse of public funds; but of course economy is often a matter of large policy with which such committee could not deal. For instance, it could pronounce upon an improper contract for armor-plate, but it could not pronounce upon the design of a battleship.

There has been established by Mr. Gladstone an important officer called the Controller and Auditor-General. Like our High Court judges, this official is virtually irremovable, and it is his duty to make certain that the accounts are properly presented. He is undoubtedly out of reach of political or other influence.

In the United Kingdom we have no separate States, but we do have local authorities, some of which, like the London County Council or the Glasgow Corporation, approximate in importance to a State Legislature. All these bodies prepare their accounts annually, and have to render balance sheets to the local government board. The rate-payers may, and often do, demand Local Government Board inquiries into what they consider to be unsuitable objects of expenditure. The spirit of our national finance thus permeates municipal administration.

For education and other purposes local expenditure is assisted by grants from the Imperial or, as Americans would call it, the Federal Treasury. The Treasury enters those grants as expenditures just as it would enter payments for the navy. And the local authority enters the grant as a receipt, just as if it came from a local tax.

It may be interesting if I illustrate the above explanation by a brief statement of Mr. Austen Chamberlain's Budget of this year. He assumes that he will have to spend £1,434,910,000, and that he will receive £1,201,100,000. This means that he must face a war deficit of £233,810,000. The figures are colossal, but you will notice how simply the result can be stated. Even the difficult item of money received for sale of war stores and munition factories is brought into the account by treating it frankly as revenue. Strictly it should be called capital, but the result of handling it as income is quite accurate, for it simply means that the deficit on the other side, which means new debt, is reduced.

For years the annual statement has included the Post Office, and here again the system is free from complication. All postal receipts of whatever kind, except, of course, deposits in the savings bank, are entered as revenue, just as if they were a tax on beer. All payments, whether for buildings or wages or material, are treated as expenditure. A private firm could not do this, because the buildings are assets. But the state goes on forever and represents the whole community. To raise special capital for buildings would be therefore merely to duplicate the national debt. For the same reason, we never insure our public buildings, because taxation is already paid by the whole community, and is thus a premium.

If we take over the railways, it will be comparatively simple to change their stock into national debt, and to treat their expenditure and revenue precisely as we treat that of the Post Office.

I take it that the American system is derived largely from British practice in the eighteenth century. Since then our methods have been molded as a result of the struggle between Commons and Lords.

There are two distinctions between the American procedure and ours. First, our finance now depends on one House alone, whereas in the United States the Senate has its say. Secondly, our Finance Minister sits in Parliament, whereas in this country he is excluded from Congress.

Possibly the consolidation of American finance could be achieved by a committee of one or both houses in Congress, which would receive estimates of revenue and expenditure, just as these estimates are received by the British Cabinet, and would afterwards submit them to Congress once a year as a coherent scheme. In the British Parliament there are men who think that such an Estimate Committee, working with the Government, would be an improvement at Westminster. The plan somewhat resembles the custom in the French Parliament. I am not certain myself that such a committee would improve matters at Westminster, but the mere fact that it is advocated suggests how comparatively simple it would be to supply it at Washington, provided always that statesmen were so minded.

PUTTING A COMMUNITY ON THE MILK WAGON

BY HELEN JOHNSON KEYES

OF THE STATES' RELATIONS SERVICE, UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

IN one of our Northwestern States lies a district where four months ago community activities scarcely existed. It was a dairying country, with wide distances separating its comfortable homes. The school, however, reflected none of the prosperity which was shown by the houses and farm buildings; it was a dismal, two-room structure, built on one of the most barren areas which the neighborhood possessed. Yet it was a very expensive school; expensive because its attendance was so small that the cost was exceedingly high per capita. Its average attendance was ten pupils, and, as its teacher received six hundred dollars a year, the tuition of each child amounted to over five dollars a month, and was met of course by the taxpayers. These, not unnaturally, grumbled over the high cost of education, and were inclined to seek a remedy in lowering the salary of the teacher instead of in augmenting the value of the school and promoting a larger attendance. Had there been fifty pupils, the school would have cost no more and it would have demonstrated its value five afternoons a week by the throng of boys and girls who clamorously escaped from it.

The mothers of the district, however, were overwhelmed with the work which they had to do and found it necessary to keep their children at home to assist them. Moreover, every household seemed to be a nest of physical ailments. Nobody ever felt strong, apparently, and the children were continually unwell.

The farmers of this district were members of the county farm bureau, but their wives and daughters took no part in it.

Finally, a group of husbands who had seen something of home demonstration work elsewhere interested their wives in having an agent visit their community and show them ways to prepare more nutritious meals without increased labor. The farm bureau, therefore, asked the State College to furnish some one for this purpose.

The agent who came in response to the appeal saw that faulty meal-planning was the cause, not only of excessive labor, but also of poor health. She called on the doctor, who confessed that lack of nutrition and neglect of general hygiene prevailed. He said that even the children drank very little milk, and that many of them took coffee for breakfast and little else besides hot bread. She saw the teacher, who complained of her pupils' sluggishness. They seemed tired and sleepy even in the morning, she stated, and by afternoon had no concentration at all. In answer to a question, she replied that she had never noticed what they brought with them for lunches, but guessed it was mostly ham sandwiches and pickles, and perhaps cake or crullers.

Connected with the churches were three women's societies, and the agent asked the co-operation of the clergymen in announcing and advertising the meeting among their members. One church offered its parlors for the demonstration, which she gladly accepted. Realizing that she had a long-established inertia to overcome, she solicited the use of two automobiles and volunteered to bring to the meeting any women who would leave their names at the post office. Nine women did so.

The agent drove one car herself. To collect the women at their homes and bump over the roads which curved and dipped and rippled past golden fields and flaming trees that October afternoon was a friendly prelude to co-operation. The agent, moreover, found in it an opportunity to gather impressions of her women.

She had hung on a wall of the church parlor a simple chart showing the nutritive value of milk compared with other foods and she had set up a small gasoline stove. First she asked the women what their difficulties were in planning and preparing meals. Out of their problems she spun her talk, showing what are the different elements which the body requires, the foods which must be combined in order to supply these, the comparative prices of them, and the high nutritive value of milk and its relative cheapness as a food, even at the prices which shock us. Toward the close of her talk she made junket, and by serving it to her audience turned the lesson into a party.

This was the beginning of what is known in the vocabulary of home demonstration work as a "project"—that is, an intensive study of one subject. In the present case the topic was milk. The school lasted for three days and held two sessions daily. Attendance leaped from twelve at the first meeting to thirty at the final one. It included demonstrations of the modification and pasteurization of milk for infants; a talk upon the care of milk and the importance of cleanliness and freshness; one on the value of skimmed milk in adult diet and the making of cottage cheese and its use in soups, gravies, fillings, and salads. The weighing of babies and children was undertaken and results compared with standard charts and recorded. Nine mothers promised to have their babies weighed once a week, and the doctor's wife offered to take charge of it. The doctor himself opened a free clinic by volunteering to write milk formulas for all the infants brought to him. Eleven mothers promised to feed their children a quart of milk a day, at least until the next weighing, to deny them coffee and tea, and to serve fruit and cereals or eggs for breakfast. The ladies who were in charge of the next church social voted to give a cottage-cheese supper, and with the help of the agent prepared a menu.

When the agent left the community, she had not merely taught a project, but had brought forward and placed in charge of the continuation of her work women with ability for leadership, women who heretofore had not known their talent nor made it valuable to their neighbors.

One thing, however, which she wanted to do she had found impracticable during that visit. This was to arouse interest in the serving each day in school of one hot milk dish to add cheer and nutriment to the cold box lunches. The teacher felt that this would add to her burdens, and that her function was to hear lessons, not to feed her pupils. She was upheld by the apathy of the school board, which as an incentive to mental energy would have preferred the birch rod to hot soup. Even the mothers maintained that school should not be made a kitchen, and when the agent reminded them that the people at home ate their heartiest meal at the hour when the children ate meagerly out of their boxes the parents compromised on the preparation of better boxes, planned according to written instructions of the agent's, but stubbornly declined to have the labors of the kitchen performed in an institute of learning.

Three months later this agent returned to the community. The local leaders whom she had aroused were carrying on successfully the measures which she had initiated. There was a marked subsidence of colic, and many mothers and babies were sleeping the night through. Some remarkable results of milk-drinking were shown by the weight chart, the most striking of which was the case of a boy seven years old who gained three pounds during the first month that he drank a quart of milk a day, two pounds the second month, and lost a pound the third month, when he no longer had milk.

The teacher candidly expressed her surprise at an improvement in the alertness and concentration of her children. Average attendance had increased from ten to fourteen pupils. Housewives were pleased with the economies in meat which the use of milk and cheese had made possible, and farmers were gratified because their surplus of skim milk left after the stock was fed had been proved an excellent human food and worth salvage from the drain-pipes, where formerly it had been poured.

Availing herself of the universal satisfaction which prevailed, the agent gave a demonstration in the schoolhouse of ways to prepare cream soups, creamed vegetables, and cocoa, suggesting again that the pupils would be benefited by the hot dish. One mother offered to furnish the milk for a week if her daughter were permitted to prepare and serve the food during that time. The idea that to cook and serve was an honor stirred the other mothers, all of whom suddenly desired the privilege for their children. One of them offered the loan of a stove if her daughter could cook the next week. Even the washing of dishes was exalted into a knightly privilege, one mother offering two dish towels if her son might perform this useful service. Gradually, saucepan, plates, cups, and spoons were donated or lent, and finally the teacher, swept from her moorings by the high tide of enthusiasm, was seen by the agent frantically waving her hand as if she were herself a pupil seeking to interrupt the august progress of a recitation. Being called upon to speak, she offered the gift of a double boiler. The agent knew at that moment that her watched pot had boiled!

The results of this specific experiment are still coming in each month with the reports of the agent. They have been so satisfactory to parents, teacher, and pupils that there is no talk of discontinuing the "Eat-Milk Campaign" or the hot school lunch, which has been made self-supporting by the charge of three cents a dish. The mental work and the conduct of the pupils have improved as a result of a more sufficient diet, and average attendance has increased to twenty. The children are showing an interest in good house-keeping and in health laws, and there seems to be a new realization that education and schools are linked to life. Women who a few months ago labored cheerlessly, because they had only a limited conception of what a woman's work may produce in the way of health and the power of usefulness, now have a respect for their duties because they see their significance.

THE QUESTION OF FIUME

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE BY ELBERT FRANCIS BALDWIN

THE Bay of Fiume looks like the Bay of Naples. In place of the island of Capri you have the island of Cherso; in place of Vesuvius and the Italian hills you have the Dinaric Alps and the Istrian Mountains.

The city of Fiume looks like a piece of Prague or Budapest—that is to say, it looks like a Slav or Hungarian city rather than like an Italian one. The Hungarians (in power here since last November) were jealous of Italian influence and took good care that building-permits should be granted only where the architecture of the new structures was less Italian than had been that of the old.

THE CROATS

I am staying with a Slav family in Fiume. I could not get a room in any hotel; I went to them all. At the last one the manager kindly tried to obtain lodging for me in a private house, and, after some vain attempts, finally secured me a place with this Croat family. They have given me much information concerning the general Slav side of the situation here and the attitude of that important branch of the Slav race, the Croats, in particular.

When my landlady heard that I was an American, she grasped my hands and said: "The Americans are our friends. Welcome to you!" Then she proceeded: "You will see some things here that you may not understand. For instance, all Fiume is beflagged. Every house flies the Italian colors. You doubtless assume that every one here wants Italy to rule over us. But it is not so. You do not realize that the Italian authorities have forced the Croats to fly Italian colors—why, even our big Croatian banks and steamship agencies were overawed. In this way the true number of Slavs, whether Croats or Slovenes, in the population is not evident. It is far larger than the Italians will admit. They have done everything possible to make their proportion of Fiume and Istria as to population appear larger; for example, Slovenes and Croats have been deported on various pretexts, particularly sanitary pretexts. Then you have read in the Italian newspapers that there were many thousands in the pro-Italy procession two days ago. You probably thought them all men, and so doubtless did the simple Italian people in reading their papers. Yet half of this procession was made up of women and children—it was easy enough to get the children, as the Italians control the schools. But that is not all. Last winter, when we were starving, the Italians refused us food unless we would swear allegiance to Italy. We finally got some food from the French. Why, the Italians have even invaded the proper order of church services. Nor will they tell the truth about us in their newspapers over on the mainland. Time after time an Italian kills or outrages or maltreats a Croat. A week goes by. You find the occurrence reported in the Italian paper with the names reversed; it is always the Croat who has killed the Italian. We believe that our Trumbich has told your Wilson about these things and that the Signore Presidente sympathizes with the under dog."

"Certainly he does," I answered. "So do we all." But I could not help thinking that the Croatian plea of oppression—so appealing—would be far more so if all Croats were, physically, mentally, and morally, as attractive as is my landlady.

Slav opposition to Italian aims is even more economic than political. While some Slavs concede that the city of Fiume, taken by itself, might logically be under Italian political control, they contend that you cannot separate a city from its hinterland; and in this case, that hinterland, pure Slav in population, surrounds the city. Of course the inhabitants of the hinterland want to control Fiume. They come sharply against the boundary of the city proper. I am living on that boundary—that is to say, on a boulevard at the city's extreme southern limit, bounded by a river, along which runs our boulevard. Across the river lies the suburb of Susak (Italian, Sussak). The Croats pronounce it Shooshak. The Italians were much perturbed when they heard that the head of the American contingent was living in a boarding-house in the exclusively Croat suburb of Susak.

Fiume is the port for northern Croatia and much of Slovenia, still farther north, but specially for their former sovereigns, Hungary and Austria respectively. Fiume is entirely developed as a harbor. Practically as good Croatian harbors, Becari and Segna, exist farther south. Hence some Croats have proposed that, if the Peace Conference did assign Fiume to Italy, it should not do so until Italy agreed to give equal economic rights at Fiume to Croatia for, say, ten years, when one of the other harbors would presumably have been developed.

Jugoslavia should consist of Slovenia, Croatia, Bosnia, Herzegovina, Dalmatia, Montenegro, and above all Serbia. Some of these states are most directly served by Dalmatian, Montenegrin, and Albanian harbors.

But the Government of Jugoslavia is unfortunately as yet only a government on paper. Serbia—as if she were the Prussia of the combination—insists that Jugoslavia shall be apparently a Greater Serbia under her royal house, instead of a confederation under nobody's royal house—the only form of government to which many Montenegrins and many Croats will submit. Every one, the Italians included, wishes Jugoslavia well, and hopes that a new state, like Switzerland, may emerge. There can be no such assurance for its creation and continuance, however, as exists in the case of Czechoslovakia.

Croatian commerce consists mostly in the exportation of timber; Croatia is rich in it. But this trade, the Italians assert, amounts to less than ten per cent of the total. The principal use of Fiume is in the transit of goods to and from Central Europe. It thus occupies a distinctly international position. Recognizing this, some of the more broad-minded Croats would agree not to demand the port purely for themselves, but simply that it be made a free port under Allied control. Or, if not that, then a modus vivendi should be reached with Italy as above indicated.

THE ITALIANS

So much for the Slav. Now for the Italian. You journey from Venice to Trieste through villages ruined by the war, some of them indeed entirely shot away. You see immense heaps of rusty barbed wire. Along the Piave, Tagliamento, and Isonzo Rivers, which you cross, are hundreds of graveyards. Here it was where Italy lost half a million men, killed in defending humanity and decency and in regaining the lands which should be hers. The snowy Alps to the north are now Italy's frontiers. She has redeemed the province of Trent, where nine out of every ten men have always been Italian. She has redeemed the Italian-looking and Italian-speaking city of Trieste. She has gained possession of the provinces of Gorizia and Istria, where Italian influence is predominant. One might think that this would satisfy her. But no, she wants to unite all her children under one roof.

Hence she wants the city of Fiume, of whose 60,000 population, so a Fiuman municipal official told me, two-thirds are Italian, a sixth Slav, and the remaining sixth mixed. To confirm this preponderance, I walked everywhere in the city yesterday, specially in the sparsely settled quarters, where at least the little children would not be withheld from speaking their mother tongue. Yet everywhere I heard only Italian. I was well prepared, therefore, for my official's conclusion: "As between Italians and Croats there is no question as to where the city's political control should be. It should be with the Italians."

For three centuries this official's family has been prominent in Fiume. He continued: "Would that President Wilson could have visited Fiume before he decided against Italy! He would have seen that if a vote were to be taken here under his exclusive direction—and I wish it might be—the result would be overwhelmingly for union with Italy. He would also see that Fiume is not the only Slav outlet in these parts, as he seems to think. There is no reason why the Croatian ports south of us should not be developed; moreover, the Italians would doubtless grant compensating privileges to the Slavs of whatever nationality during the time of development."

He added: "Speaking of Slavs, you Americans often make the mistake of saying 'Slav' when you mean only Croat, Slovene, or Serb. Now our feeling in Fiume (and we sent many a man to aid the Entente) towards our allies in the war—the Serbs and Montenegrins—is perfectly friendly. But our feeling is of course the same as Italy's towards her Slav enemies—the Slovenes, Croats, and Bosnians—who fought fiercely and bar-barously against Italy to the very last moment of the war. That feeling is naturally resentful and unfriendly. How would you like it, Signore, if your enemies, the Germans, after their atrocities with regard to the Lusitania and other boats, asked you to give them a port in America?"

Only comparatively recently have the Italians realized that, economically, the possession of Fiume by any one other than themselves might endanger the commercial existence of Trieste itself. Won by the advantages to be obtained from the Slavs, were they in control, or from the certain advantages to be obtained were Fiume a free port, the great Croatian banks and transportation agencies at Trieste would move to Fiume. (And the American gains a new opinion of Croatian power when he sees the number and size of its financial and commercial institutions at Trieste.) This new economic view of Fiume's potential importance, contrasted with that of Trieste, may possibly account for some of the government-fostered, rapid rise of Fiuman sentiment in Italy, which, of course, rests primarily on a question of honor to race loyalty.

When, in 1915, at a critical moment for the Entente forces, Italy entered the war, Fiume was hardly mentioned compared with the Trentino, for instance, as something to be redeemed. As soon, however as the Trentino and other districts were redeemed, the world in general learned that the Entente Allies would deny justice to Italy unless she had Fiume too. A street poster reads as follows:

AUGUST 1914

By Italian neutrality Italy saved France

MAY 1915

By entering the war Italy saved Europe

WINTER 1915

In Albania, Italy saved the Serb army

OCTOBER 1917

OCTOBER 1918

At Vittorio Veneto Italy gave the decisive blow to the Austro-Germans

APRIL 1919

The Entente Governments deny justice to Italy!

THE FRENCH

Opposition to Italy has not come from the Slav alone. The other day at Rome a high governmental authority gave me a more comprehensive view of the situation. I was told that opposition to the Italian aim has also come from France and England.

That from France is due to the fact that the French have always been jealous of a possible Italian commercial preponderance in the Mediterranean. But Genoa went on gaining over Marseilles. Naples helped. Now Trieste has come in. Shall Fiume be added too? "Not if those who run French finance can help it. They will secretly work to check Italy, no matter how smooth the French papers may be to us," said my informant, who then proceeded to pay respects to the British.

THE BRITISH

Fiume is an established port for British lines; I saw their offices here yesterday. Those British companies want to keep this port free from the oppressive harbor regulations and tariffs of other ports. My informant, who is close to the secrets of the Sonnino Cabinet, remarked: "In my belief, the English steamship lines have supplied the writers for at least two of the most powerful papers in Great Britain with money enough to spread abroad Slav propaganda, not because they like the Slav, save as he is more easy-going, but with the one aim of making Fiume as undisturbed a source of British profit as possible."

And yet, on the other hand, it might appear as if the British were working with the Italians. For the protection of law and order on the upper Adriatic, menaced by the Italo-Croatian situation, the Entente Allies assigned last November the guarding of the ports of Cattaro to the French, Spalato to the Americans, Pola to the Italians—the Allies being thus careful not to assign to the Italians Fiume, the place of greatest danger; Fiume was given to the English, and the English have had a long record of success in dealing with such situations. They have a battalion of a thousand men here. I hear the attitude and service of those men commended by Croats, Italians, and Americans alike. We have also had a supplementary force here headed by Major Furlong. In this capacity he was present the other day when, in the beautiful Palazzo Municipio, the city authorities solemnly proclaimed again the annexation of Fiume, in so far as they could sanction it, to Italy. General Grazioli, the ranking official among the Allies here, in his address of acknowledgment, thus alluded to the American official:

Without the slightest provocation to any one, and with absolute respect to the sentiments of others, I wish that the valorous American official, to whom I have the honor of offering the hospitality of my palace and whom I welcome here as a witness of your tenacious Italian determination, could telegraph to Paris and to the whole world that the Italy here in Fiume is only the pure and simple affirmation of an evident right entirely conciliatory with the rights and opinions of other peoples.

That the English have permitted the presence here of an officer of higher rank than any of theirs, the Italians thus being apparently in supreme command on shore (as the Italian admiral seems to be among the Allied war-vessels at anchor in the port), might indicate that the British Government does not altogether sympathize with the pro-Croat position taken by the newspapers mentioned, even though it might not consent to a complete Italian control of Fiume.

PRESIDENT WILSON

Finally, there is President Wilson. His proclamations have cheered the Croats and correspondingly embittered the Italians. A great Roman lady said to me the other day, "Io vorrei gettarlo dalla rocca tarpeia" (I would like to throw him off the Tarpeian Rock). But this is not all. The ignorant and simple interpret a minority President's personal opinion in terms of America as a whole. Hence we have been advised by some American officials not to go out more than necessary, and, when we do, not to speak English. I have heard of no American harmed, but I have overheard many unpleasant remarks. Even the usually courteous Italian officials were tart at first when I applied to the carabinieri (the military police) at Trieste for a permit to visit Fiume—of all places! The officer in charge, examining my passport, ironically said: "Ah, you come from the country of our friend Wilson," but quietly added: "Well, Wilson is not all America. We blame Wilson, not America. His is simply the personal opinion of an American unfamiliar with Europe but conscientiously trying to solve the most delicate of European problems. Of course your President doubtless wants to do justice all round. But we feel that your people, as a whole, do not accuse us, as he does, of imperialism just because we want to have an outlying part of real Italy in the same house with the rest of Italy."

On October 18, 1918, the month before the armistice came, Andrea Ossoinack, the last Deputy from Fiume to sit in the Hungarian Parliament at Budapest, reported to it the spontaneous decision of the people to belong to Italy. On October 30 the Fiumani repelled the Croatian attempt to conquer them, the Croatians still fighting for the Central Powers, and again proclaimed the Fiuman will to be annexed to Italy. "Indeed, they have always wanted to be united to the Italians," Signor Ossoinack asserted. "To deny to Fiume this right is to violate the principle of self-determination laid down by President Wilson himself."

Another remarked: "We have reason to believe that your President came to his decision months ago. He has been cruel to us in not making his opinion known sooner, and especially after ostentatiously coming to Italy as her friend and accepting the King's hospitality last January."

Another said: "That which Germany did not succeed in getting by war Signor Wilson thinks he can get by peace. If Italy had bowed to his word, she would not only have abandoned her proper right but would have sanctioned further American interference. We wish to check that interference. Why should you get mixed up in our problems, anyway? You would not like us to impose ourselves in America."

As to this particular issue, the President's proclamation to the Italian people was tantamount, they thought, to disputing the authority of their delegates at Paris. The net result at Rome is the convening of Parliament, which overwhelmingly supports the Italian delegates. The net result is that the Italians, being on top because of greater numbers here, and the Slavs, expecting to be on top, not only because of greater numbers in the country but specially because of the Wilson encouragement, are more than ever ready to fly at one another's throats. Last night we had half an hour of shooting right out in the street below. My landlady came rushing into the parlor crying: "La guerra è ricominciata! La guerra è ricominciata! Tutti in Susak si pian-gono" (The war has begun again! The war has begun again! All Susak weeps and complains)—which meant an Italian onslaught. To-day it is hard to decide which side provoked the fray. Anyway, the Italians have increased their contingent here, and one of our officers from Trieste, who had just arrived, reports having seen Italian guns newly mounted on the outskirts of Fiume.

Fiume has long resisted Croatian aggression. In 1776 we Americans were not the only ones who struggled for independence. The Fiumani did too. In that year the Empress Maria Theresa of Austria assigned Fiume to Croatia—just as President Wilson would do to-day. After three years of resistance, the Fiumans obtained a charter from the Empress reuniting them to Hungary, but according them full autonomy. A century later Croatian domination was again imposed and thrown off. A Fiuman official showed me a Hungarian bank note and said: "See the Hungarian crown. It is supported by various coats of arms, and one of them is that of Fiume. Hungary thus saw the need of recognizing our independent spirit." I replied that Fiume impressed me as having the independent spirit of the old Greek and Italian cities, and asked, "Why not make it an independent republic under Italian influence, like San Marino?" "Ah, that would be the ideal solution," he answered. "Una repubblica fiumana—a Fiuman republic."

Mr. John Mitchell, a Scotchman, has lived sixteen years in Trieste. He is the director of the Jutificio Triestino, a great jute factory. He speaks from an intimate experience of the needs of the various people using Adriatic ports. He thinks that the only solution for the peace of the whole region lies in giving Italy political control of the city proper of Fiume, and in making its port free, like Hamburg, with advantages to all alike. This, I find, is also the general opinion among other foreign observers who enjoy any detached point of view from which they can see the whole situation.

The main thing is to do justice and to avoid another war. To do justice the Peace Conference must assure entire economic freedom to the new and untried Jugoslavia. To avoid another war it must not create any more Italia Irredenta. It can do both. Will it?

More than this, Fiume forms the first incident to prove whether a Society of Nations can be a going concern or not. Most of us are sure that it can be.

Fiume, April 28, 1919.

VACATIONS WITH A CAMERA

BY HENRY HOYT MOORE

MEMBER EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, PICTORIAL PHOTOGRAPHERS OF AMERICA

ILLUSTRATED WITH SIX PHOTOGRAPHS BY THE AUTHOR

ALL sorts of vacations are good, but the vacation that has an avocation attached to it is peculiarly delightful. There is a zest to such a vacation that unalloyed loafing fails to give. And of all the avocations, that of the devotee of the camera is perhaps the most alluring. If he doesn't take it too seriously, it is an unfailing source of amusement. The puzzles as to light and shade, proper exposure, focusing, etc., give him untiring themes for thinking and talking about. Getting "natives" to pose for him, or taking them unawares, gives him a chance to make acquaintance with their peculiarities which he would otherwise never have. And if he pursues the hobby long enough, he may even learn something about Art—at any rate, he may learn to look at pictures with a new interest. Inspecting art galleries is sure to take up considerable of one's time in foreign countries, especially if one has the advantage of seeing them with an art-loving wife. So that anything that helps to an appreciation of pictures is a gain. Even if the camera devotee always remains a mere snap-shotter, his prints will invariably bring vividly before him in after years the scenes of his outing trips. The cost—well, it will probably not amount to as much as the cigars or cigarettes that the average man burns up with complete nonchalance. If, however, he develops into a "camera bug," the devotee may amuse himself by spending anything within reason, or out of it, on boxes, lenses, enlarging apparatus, and equipment generally.

I started my vacations with a camera back in the days when that seductive announcement first began to appear—"You press the button, we do the rest." I bought a five-dollar camera that carried a roll of film, a dozen exposures in all, of about the size of a silver dollar. This I took with me on a trip on the Great Lakes from Buffalo to Duluth. This trip was something of a novelty then, and there were two great steamers that made it, carrying passenger traffic exclusively—the Northwest and the Northland. I took a lot of snaps of these ships and of the whalebacks and other strange craft that were encountered, the big docks at the Soo, etc. Some of these little photographs were accepted with an article that I wrote about the trip for a magazine—and I was fairly started on the picture-making road.

I have always carried a camera of some kind with me since that time. Sometimes I have taken one of the cheapest sort, and sometimes one of the expensive reflex variety; and I am bound to say that the photographs of the cheap camera are likely to turn out about as well as those made with the costly instrument. I refer, of course, to those depicting outdoor scenes. For indoor use a more elaborate apparatus is needed for serious work. With a three-dollar camera I once made a lucky snap that was valued so highly by one of the best known of American pictorial photographers that he offered to exchange any one of his best prints for a copy of it, and then honored it by giving it a prominent place in his showcase. And I have made scores of photographs with the same camera that were "punk"—just as I have done with the high-priced reflex. For I believe that nobody can tell exactly what he has "got" when he uses his camera, of whatever price, until his exposure has stood the test of developing and printing. One of the pioneers of pictorial photography in this country—a woman—once remarked to me, "If I get one 'picture' out of a dozen exposures, I count myself lucky."

Of course experience helps a lot in this as in everything else, but there are so many factors in the making of a good photographic picture, of which the camera is only one, that the result of an exposure can never be predicted with certainty. "What a fine lens you must have!" is recognized by good camerists as a remark derogatory to their skill. It is not the lens, any more than it is a paint-pot, that produces a picture. A skilled photographer can, indeed, produce a charming picture without any lens whatever—using a pin-hole in a piece of cardboard to reflect the image on his plate.

Of course I am not decrying the use of the large, expensive camera with a high-priced anastigmatic lens—it is all right in its place and in the right hands. But for a vacation one ought not to be a pack-horse for carrying photographic equipment. So, I say, take with you a small camera using films, which you can expose freely without depleting your pocketbook too much, and then, if you get some "pictures," you can easily make enlargements from these small films that will bring them up to a respectable size. Use these films freely, study the effects of light and shade, see a good photographic exhibition occasionally to keep yourself from getting too greatly elated at your successes, read a good book on composition now and then, and your vacations with a camera will show photographic results that will give you genuine pleasure and make your friends keen for souvenirs of your skill.

The four years of war are over, and the camera-user will soon again be welcome in Europe. That is the land of picturesque castles, bridges, towers, fountains, and monuments, all waiting to be made into pictures by the American tourist. It is also the land of varied and pictorial costumes, worn by people who are usually well disposed toward the kodak carrier. I remember a kindly French priest, who, when he saw me trying to take a hurried snapshot of him, stopped and offered to pose for me at my leisure. One has many such joyous memories. But we have no need to travel abroad for good subjects for camera work. "The angel sought so far away is waiting at your door." Childhood is everywhere, waiting for a picture. So are summer girls. And America's scenery—ought we not to have a new "Picturesque America" made up of photographs? Why not begin one for yourself?

THE STARWARD TRAIL

BY DANIEL HENDERSON

"Tennyson's dream of an aerial fleet—
Pooh! An idle bard's conceit!"

Thus we mocked the pioneers
Plotting highways to the spheres!

Thus we clung to humdrum things
And scorned their lore of winds and wings!

Foolish it seemed to us to mark
The sudden rise of the meadow-lark!

How could mankind hope to follow
The falcon's swoop, the flight of a swallow?

While we grumbled, while we scoffed,
Still, thank God, they looked aloft!

Seaward, where a gray gull clove
Mists that curtained cape and cove,

They saw a new Columbus dare
Illimitable seas of air!

The eagle breasting the coastwise gale
Marked for them the way of the mail,

And where snow-fleeing bird tribes went
To find a tropic continent,

They saw ethereal roads astir
With many a human voyager!

"Cling to the old and flout the new!"
Age through age, the law holds true,

Yet—the Dreamer again has won!
Up, and follow his path to the sun!

A DAY WITH A NATURE GUIDE

BY ENOS A. MILLS

ONE morning six variously attired people, four gentlemen and two ladies, started from a hotel in the Rocky Mountain National Park with a Nature Guide. An automobile whirled them to the end of the road far up the mountain-side, where they continued afoot. They were bound for one of the "eternal" snow-drifts on the Continental Divide.

The essence of Nature Guiding is to travel gracefully rather than to arrive. This Guide tactfully put two or three at ease by convincing them that in the United States the belief in ferocious animals is a superstition. "And no one," he continued, "in this locality has ever been attacked by a wild animal." The day was perfect, but so interestingly did the Guide describe experiences in storms that every one hoped to be Rain-in-the-Face before evening.

The Guide was jollied for being silent. The party asked for rubber-neck specialties and demanded where their megaphone artist was. They were climbing in a V-shaped canyon, traveling west. Presently the Guide pointed out that the right, or north wall, rises steeply in the sun and is covered with a scattered growth of stocky, long-armed pines. The left, or south wall, which faces north, has a crowded growth of short-armed, tall spruces. In the bottom of the canyon between these closely approaching, unlike forests is a lively stream with a few accompanying firs, willows, and flowers.

Each member of the party remembered something of plant distribution, and each contributed something to the discussion concerning plant zones, slope exposures, temperature, and moisture—the determinism of ecological influences. When the scraps of information ceased, the Guide added that each canyon wall also had its special kinds of insect and mammal life.

The Nature Guide is at his best when he discusses facts so that they appeal to the imagination and to the reason, gives flesh and blood to cold facts, makes life stories of inanimate objects. He deals with principles rather than isolated information, gives biographies rather than classifications. People are out for recreation and need restful, intellectual visions, and not dull, dry facts, rules, and manuals.

MISS ESTHER A. BURNELL, THE FIRST NATURE GUIDE LICENSED BY THE GOVERNMENT

Many nature guides are women

What the Guide said was essentially Nature literature rather than encyclopædia natural history.

This party being interested in the distribution of life and in erosion, the Guide made these the features of the day's excursion. In a mountain region life zones are seen side by side; the wear and tear on the earth's surface by many forces stands out unmistakably, and two or three types of erosion may, in places, be seen from one view-point.

All that the Guide said concerning erosion could be set down under the heading "The Biography of a Canyon." In this the various forces of erosion—running water, frost, ice, and acid—each at work in its respective place with distinctive tools, were prying, wedging, cutting the canyon wider and deeper. Roots wedged the rocks and dissolved them with acids. But at the same time they helped also to resist these tireless forces, placing a binding, holding network of fibers. Gravity handled the transportation of dislodged material.

Each species of plant and animal is of orderly distribution, is found in places that furnish the needed temperature and moisture condition. The Guide's discussion of each living species was its autobiography: "The Story of My Life: or, How I Came to be Where I Am and What I Am." In this he gave the adventure, the customs of plant or animal, the home territory wherein it lived, its climatic zone, and all the endless and insistent play of the radical and romantic forces of evolution, environment, and ecology.

A few popular and scientific names of species were learned, but the Guide was reticent about telling plant names. His chief aim was to arouse a permanent interest in nature's ways, and this by illuminating big principles.

Climbing out of the canyon up a moderate slope just under timber-line, this party halted among the trees and remained silent for a few minutes on the edge of a small grassy opening. A deer and her two spotted fawns walked out into this, then went across into the woods.

All followed a porcupine that was lumbering across the opening, ignoring their presence. The Guide remarked that there may have been a time when the porcupine threw his quills, standing up and hurling them, he imagined, as a primitive man hurled a spear, but that the development of this animal would prevent the quills being thrown more than three or four inches. However, the other woods fellows made it their business to keep out of his way. He had long been known as "the stupidest fellow moisture, and temperature conditions. The soil along the upper edges of the snow-field was coarse and dry, below fine and moist. Each species of plant was occupying the peculiar place in which it could best flourish or from which it could in the woods;" he is the only one who never appears to play, who has no interest in natural history, or Nature Guides either, nor the world.

Up and on they went, except a lady and a gentleman who lingered to watch porky. In the edge of the woods the Guide stopped to wait for them. Plainly panic-stricken they were, just disappearing in the woods headed north. Asking the others not to stir until he returned, the Guide dashed after them.

On reuniting the party the Guide discussed the necessity of all staying together. "Most people," he said, "are easily confused and lost. It is thus bad for one to forge ahead, or to turn aside, or to stay behind. Moving together is absolutely necessary for the happiness of the party."

"Once," he continued, "a capable fellow said he would go ahead and wait for us at the foot of a near-by cliff. He never reached the cliff. While looking for him others of the party scattered, and each and all were lost and remained out overnight."

A little before noon the party walked out of the uppermost edge of the woods among the dwarfed trees and distorted groves at timber-line—an aged and battered forest of trees, small and strange. They were above the altitude of eleven thousand feet.

Before them on the edge of an arctic moorland lay a snow-field about two blocks long. It appeared somewhat like uncut marble. Stained with rock dust, inlaid with wind-blown beetles and grasshoppers, its granular material lay melting in the sun. A bright flower border encircled it. This was made up of flowers of many kinds and colors, flowers with and without perfume, flowers dwarfed, and flowers on tall, stately stalks. In small compass were a variety of soil, exclude competitors. It was determinism—conditions determining the distribution.

It probably is true that many of these dwarfed flowers were developed around the Arctic Circle. The Guide recounted the great ice age story—how seeds and life had been swept southward by the ice and by retreating birds and animals who gave way before the irresistible slow-moving glacier. On the mountains the seeds grew—found a home; so too the ptarmigan, in somewhat similar conditions to the old one in the Arctic. In this new colony party is absorbed in details. But a Nature Guided party is vastly different from these. In a Nature party its members have a common interest. They are not in a hurry, they are in a mood to be human. They make intimate friendships while getting acquainted with Nature and with themselves. They take on a wider, happier outlook. All are glad to be living.

Leaving the snow-field, these people rambled along the timber-line. They saw the dwarfed trees and the deformed trees, they noted the pines that held the forest front on dry, wind-swept ridges, and the spruces that triumphed in the moist places. Timber-line has a thousand interesting stories for the visitor. Here the party lingered till near evening.

At the foot of the mountain near the automobile they examined a beaver colony and saw where sediment-filled ponds had become beaver meadows; they watched the evening antics and activities of the few beavers that commonly came forth about sundown; and at last they started for the car, discussing the beaver in history and his place in conservation.

An acquaintance with Nature is worth while. A well-known university man says: "What I wish to bring out particularly does not concern the enrichment of botanical and zoölogical knowledge, greatly important as I regard this, but rather the enlarging and liberalizing influences which Nature has on the public mind generally."

The world is beginning to appreciate the necessity of an outside interest. Fortunate is the individual who has a Nature hobby. Such an interest is known to improve health, lengthen life, and increase efficiency. An excursion with a Nature Guide may give the individual a better hobby.

On other days the interest of the Na-these birds and flowers still maintain the traditions of their respective old families.

A picnic party usually does much talking and more eating. A sightseeing party often does things by the book and talks by comparison. A botany or a birding ture party was one of a varied range. Timber-line, what determines it, and the species of trees that compose it; beavers, their part in conservation and their influence on the settlement and exploration of America; parasitic plants; the story of soil; the birth, life, and death of a lake; home territory of animals; wind, the great seed-sower, are among the themes sometimes discussed. Each person received a chapter in a natural history story which helped him to be eager for other chapters which he might find anywhere outdoors.

The bighorn, or wild mountain sheep, was frequently seen at close range. Why they lived in the heights among the peaks the year round was a story that ever stirred. Their scene-commanding, wild environment has exacted of them alertness, positiveness, sharp eyes, and the ability to safely play where there is much space and little substance beneath them.

In connection with schools and education field studies and classes afield are excellent. There is too little of this, and most of it is too serious and amounts almost to being an invasion of Nature, with the miserly intent of amassing facts. The romance and the vision possible usually are overlooked. Nature casts no spell, gives no new landscapes to the student's life. Field studies are chiefly concerned with acquiring facts; Nature Guiding, with giving new landscapes and reaching the imagination.

A few people for years have practiced Nature Guiding occasionally. It has made good, and it has a place in National life. It carries with it health, new ideas, and inspiration. Last year Nature Guiding was given a definite place in several of the National parks by the Government's licensing a number of Nature Guides to conduct people through the wilds. A Nature Guide is an interpreter of geology, botany, zoölogy, and natural history. Nature ever is liberalizing, and the Nature Guide is one of the forces moving for the newer education and for the ideal of internationalism.

Nature Guiding is a magnificent field for young people who are well equipped and who have a vision. Many Guides are young women. Some one has called the imagination the supreme intellectual faculty, and Nature Guiding aims chiefly to appeal to this. Thus rainy days and night trips are recommended because on these the things seen are few and most strange, incomplete, and suggestive.

Nature Guiding is not like sightseeing or the scenery habit. The Guide sometimes takes his party to a commanding view-point or a beautiful spot. But views are incidental. The aim is to illuminate and reveal the alluring world outdoors by introducing determining influences and the respondent tendencies.

A Nature Guide should have imagination. He should be able to discuss the essentials in concise, suggestive statements, but generally remain silent. He should have a knowledge of human nature.

Children enthusiastically enjoy a day with a Nature Guide, and fortunate the child who can have a number of these excursions. They are thought-compelling, interest-arousing. Children are led after the manner of old people. They must not be talked down to. The Guide may enter a little more intimately into their joys, perhaps, making slight readjustment to their tastes. As a rule the imagination of children is more readily and definitely fired than that of older people.

AT THE TIMBER-LINE

"They saw the dwarfed trees and the deformed trees"

One day a Guide was out with several children under eight years of age. They discussed a double-topped spruce. They learned that the former single top was broken off and that the two topmost twigs then bent upwards and raced for leadership. They had run a dead heat, as it were, and both of them became the leaders. During the remainder of the day the children often spotted a double-topped tree. The cones of trees were noticed, and, of course, the cones of the balsam fir caused comment because these stood upon the limbs instead of hanging from them.

In a small area where a forest fire had swept fifteen years before a few live veteran trees had survived. An examination of two of these revealed old fire scars. One of these scars indicated that the tree had been injured by the fire of fifteen years before and by another fire of eighty-seven years previous. A few young aspens and thousands of young lodge-pole seedlings were starting. Why the lodge-pole pines were the first to start in the burned-over area was a question that brought out a discussion concerning what trees were commonly the first to appear in a cleared or burned-over area, and why. Only a few species of young trees thrive in the sunlight; others need shade in which to start. This principle appealed to the children.

An old seed-hoarding lodge-pole on the edge of the burned area was surrounded. It had borne a crop of cones each year for seventeen years. All of these cones, unopened, clung thickly over its limbs. A few days before, the Guide had led a party of older people over precisely the route followed by these children. He had talked to both parties similarly, but apparently the children had more deep and lasting enjoyment out of the day.

John Muir is said to have been an almost ideal Nature Guide. He reached both the young and the old. His botany and geology commonly were in the nature of a story. The past struggles and triumphs of the plant, its present influences, its response to environment, its relation to ourselves, were artistically mingled with the essential facts of its life.

Nature Guiding need not be confined to National parks. Fabre has shown monsters and hundreds of little stirring people co-operating or battling in every growth-filled space. City parks and the wild places near cities and villages are near thousands of people and are excellent places for the cultural and inspiring excursions with Nature Guides. There might well be Nature Guides in every locality in the land.

THE FUTURE OF AERONAUTICS

BY ALAN R. HAWLEY

PRESIDENT OF THE AERO CLUB OF AMERICA

PRECEDENTS of great historic value are being established in aeronautics. For instance, not long ago steps were taken to establish the first air port in the history of the world. The purposes are interesting from a historic view-point as well as for the indications which they give of the progress of developments in aeronautics. Aircraft starting from this air port can be registered under the rules of the Aircraft Inspection Service of the Department of Commerce, having clearance papers just as the ships of the sea have.

This port will be located at Atlantic City and will be a point of departure for transatlantic liners—ocean planes, transcontinental land planes, and large rigid dirigibles which in the future may even have sufficient power to circumnavigate the globe. An ideal airship port would be an airdrome about one mile square; a double airship shed capable of housing two great dirigibles a thousand feet long; a mooring tower with bow mooring gear; mechanical handling gear for transferring the airship from the mooring tower to the shed; hydrogen generating plants and storage tanks; workshops, stores, meteorological building and wireless, telegraph, telephone, and direction signal station which would be to aircraft what the lighthouse is to marine commerce.

The mooring tower should be one hundred and fifty feet high, with a revolving head to which the airship can be fastened by its nose clear to swing around in accordance with the direction of the wind, just as a ship would swing at its moorings or anchor. Fuel and hydrogen pipes would be connected to the ship and a gangway for passengers to enter after having been brought up in an elevator from the ground. Large dirigibles have been projected in England that would have a capacity of three hundred tons and contain ten million feet of gas, with cabins for passengers on the upper side, and motive power to propel them at a speed of eighty miles an hour. Passenger rates between New York and London have been figured at £48, or $240, and the time between New York and London would be two to two and a half days, or one-half of the time of the fastest steamers. It is interesting to compare these figures with the fare figured for airplane travel, which is £115, or $585, but the journey would be accomplished in one-half the time, although the accommodations would not be so luxurious, and even the largest airplanes would be very much smaller than the airships.

It is very interesting to see how our ideas of time and distance must be entirely revised and changed on account of this new method of transportation, because we have already had flights from London to India of 5,800 miles in a little over fifty hours flying time; many flights from London to Cairo in a day and a half, and routes have been laid out between London and Colombo, four and a half days; to Perth, seven days; to Nairobi, three and a half days; to Cape Town, five and a half days; and to Rio de Janeiro, four days. Here in the United States Major T. C. Macaulay has flown from coast to coast in twenty hours flying time; from San Diego to Jacksonville, making a speed of 137 miles per hour on the major part of his journey. He has flown altogether 5,500 miles in forty-four hours fifteen minutes. Two squadrons of Army planes have flown from San Diego to Mineola and return, and we have many official reports of journeys between four and five thousand miles.

One of the most important transportation lines projected in this country is to run between Los Angeles, San Diego, and Riverside, in California, using Martin twin-motored machines, charging $25 a trip between Los Angeles and San Diego, and $12.50 between Los Angeles and Riverside. The general charges for training in this country have been $1.50 a minute, and for passenger flights at about a dollar a minute. Very soon the airplane tariff will be on the basis of fifty cents a mile a minute, and the new element of time will enter into transportation figures. In the case of very high salaried and Government officials transportation expense sinks into insignificance, while the ordinary traveling public might consider it expensive. Many will be attracted by the novelty of flying, and on special routes tourists will be attracted by the exceptional opportunities offered to view grand and magnificent scenery from the heavens.

When we have seen in America large dirigibles arrive from Europe, and now that the crossing of the Atlantic by airplane is a record of history, the development of the aircraft itself will continue to make these feats, at first hazardous, become commonplace, and all the luxuries of travel will be added, together with the advantages which aerial travel offers. Aerial routes are laid out without curve or grade, thus shortening the distances to be accomplished materially and enabling aircraft to rise above storms into regions of sunshine and when passing over deserts to rise to cooler temperatures, and in many cases to take advantage of favorable air currents, as the ships of the sea are favored by the trade winds which blow regularly over the surface of the earth. The high atmosphere is pure and free from dust and the immense spaces will prevent congestion.

One of the most important and one of the first commercial developments in aeronautics no doubt will be its use for aerial photography, giving both plan views of cities, factories, shore lines, and docks, as well as oblique views which give the perspective and the "bird's-eye" view which usually convey so much more than an ordinary surface photograph. The Forestry Commission of New York State has already arranged for taking photographs of the Adirondack Mountains, thus giving it detailed information which it could obtain in no other way and covering regions almost impassable by any other mode of locomotion. In the great Western forests special timber can be located, such as trees suitable for great masts of ships; fire areas, swamp areas, and the condition of growth can be easily and clearly seen.

The second Pan-American Aeronautic Convention, held at Atlantic City under the auspices of the Aero Club of America and the Aerial League of America, brought out many new phases of the commercial side of this large subject, and chief among them were the interesting developments in the possibilities of the aerial mail service, which has been in operation over one year between New York and Washington and which has carried more than two hundred thousand pounds of mail, representing eight million letters, with absolute regularity. The same six planes, equipped with the same engines which were used a year ago, are still in service.

On May 15, 1919, Lieutenant J. C. Edgerton, who piloted the first aerial mail plane into Washington from New York, and who is now Chief of Flying Operations of the Post Office Department, flew the same airplane and motor which he flew just one year before. Several of the planes had a record of over two hundred flying hours and fourteen thousand miles of flying per plane through all sorts of weather—snow-storms and wind gales—conclusively proving the feasibility of commercial flying.

The recently formed aerial police of New York City is another indication of the importance of aeronautics in civil life. They are under the guidance of Colonel Jefferson De Mont Thompson, Major S. Herbert Mapes, and Major Granville A. Pollock, and a splendid and efficient aerial police corps has been formed in which are many aces of the American Air Force.

One of the first of the duties of this newly formed force will be to photograph the entire city thoroughly, upon a scale which will show every detail more accurately than can be revealed in any other way. Landing-fields have been secured and facilities for patrolling the city, locating fires, preventing civil aviators from jeopardizing the safety of inhabitants, and patrolling the river; and the squadrons are prepared to respond at an instant's notice to any emergency which may arise. Other cities will soon follow the lead of New York. Newspapers will no doubt be the next to avail themselves of the news-gathering abilities of fast scout flying planes, while sightseeing buses will follow, and transportation lines in the due course of development.

The subject of aerial insurance has received a great deal of attention both in this country and abroad, and it is now possible to get insurance (1) upon damage to machines from any cause; (2) accidents to passengers and pilots; (3) loss or damage to goods in transit; (4) liability of injury to the public or damage to the property of the public. Twenty of the leading insurance companies in England have combined to underwrite this insurance, each company acting independently and issuing its own policies. In this country insurance at reasonable rates can be obtained and will greatly add to the practicable financing of large companies.

To give an idea of the estimated cost of running a transatlantic airship service from London to New York, it would be necessary to provide for—

Interest, depreciation, insurance, operating expenses, repairs, and maintenance, on a basis of four airships of 3,500,000 cubic feet capacity, at a cost of $2,000,000 each.....	$8,000,000
Two double airship sheds at $1,500,000 each.....	3,000,000
Land for two sheds for airdromes at $150,000 each.....	300,000
Workshops, gas plant, and equipment.....	750,000
Working capital, including operating ports, stores, etc.....	850,000
Wireless equipment.....	50,000
Miscellaneous accessories.....	50,000

Total capital required..... $13,000,000

Annual charges would be:

Interest on capital, depreciation, insurance, establishment expenses, repairs, maintenance.....	Total $5,000,000
---	-------------------

This equipment would provide a semi-weekly service of 200 crossings a year at a total charge per crossing of $33,000, which, for 140 passengers, would make the cost per passenger about $240.

The navigation of airships is similar to that of steamships, but is made more difficult by reason of drift, which has to be allowed for. When navigating over land, the pilot is able to determine the drift of the airship by observation of suitable fixed places on the earth's surface, and adjust his compass course accordingly to give the desired true course. When navigating over seas, no fixed places are available, so if the motion of the wind is not known the course must be corrected by astronomical observation and determination of his charted position. A reliable and effective method of navigation is available, however, with the wireless installation. If the ship is in communication with two stations, they can determine the direction of the transmitted waves and signal to the ship its bearing, from which the ship's position can be laid off on its charts and the new departure determined.

With airplanes the speed would be much faster, but the cost would be about twice as much, and there would be less room to move about and less comfort in travel. For long-distance voyages there is no doubt that the airship will be the more practicable.

Before the war there was a constant use of airships in civil flying in Germany by the airships of 1910-11, and the annual reports of the companies operating showed a total number of flights of 826, with a duration of 1,853 hours, covering 102,675 miles, carrying 17,221 passengers, and this was done without any mishaps to passengers.

The ships were equipped most luxuriously, with inlaid mahogany paneling, carpeted floors, and comfortable arm-chairs—in fact, regular Pullman car fittings—with large windows, and luncheon and tea was served from a buffet. Twenty-five dollars was charged for a three-hour trip, and places had to be booked many days ahead. Regular trips were run from Berlin to Leipsic, and from Dresden to Munich. The companies made a profit and received a subsidy from the German Government for the use of the ships for training army and navy crews. There is no doubt that Germany to-day is preparing for an extensive scheme of air travel, and only recently there was organized a company, it was announced, to operate airships from Berlin to Constantinople, stopping at Munich and Vienna.

New inventions are being made all the time to increase the safety of air travel, parachutes are being perfected, men are being more perfectly trained, and scientific methods are used to record the physical and medical phenomena incident to flying.

Civilization is developing to a point where rapid aerial transportation and intercommunication are making the world smaller and smaller, and political questions in remote corners of the world that never touched our lives are now entering our very doors.

A marvelous future is opening for aerial navigation, and progress takes place faster than the world in general can keep up with the advance. Only a short time ago we were talking about the transatlantic flight, and now it is accomplished, and still more wonderful things are conceived of as within the range of aeronautic possibility.

LA PARMACHENE BELLE!

A STREAM, A SUPERSTITION, AND A SERMON

BY JOSEPH H. ODELL

I
THAT man is not a sport who does not begin his trout fishing in mid-winter, when the woods are deep in snow and the ice thick upon the pools. My season usually opens suddenly, as if an unseen hand had touched a secret spring. This year it began on New Year's Day, when a friend sent me an art calendar. The picture wiped out the four months of wild weather that were to come and bade the birds sing, the fronds of ferns to uncurl, and the stream to flash brilliantly in the early May sunshine. But I moved forward by going backward—the art calendar awakened rich memories of the seasons past. The subject was only a detail, but such a detail! There was no foreground, no background, no horizon; the canvas was a surface of translucent water, and, rising through it, with head just breaking into air, was a superb trout, making his rise for a fly—a Parmachene Belle—drooping from a taut leader which ran diagonally across the picture from the lower left to the upper right corner. In a moment, from that vivid detail, I reconstructed the entire scene—the fisherman standing in the swift current above the pool, last year's leaves lying among the yellow froth just beyond the cast, the labyrinth of the green-tinged twigs overhead, the broken clouds in the wind-swept sky, and the muscles of the wrist that would set the hook almost before the weight of the fish could be felt upon the line.

That evening was one of sheer delight. Gone were all the regrets of the past months; stifled were all the poignant yearnings blended with bitter frustration; obliterated was the one awful fear which drove me to my tasks day after day and held my eyes unsealed through the weary hours of many and many a night. For all honest men live in a purgatory of dread that, after all, they may fail in the one thing honest men long most to do—provide decently for their loved ones. Among my friends I know not one who asks anything for himself; vainglory, ambition, epicureanism, are absent; but to one and all life would seem satisfactory and well worth while if only no shadow of future poverty and shame were hanging over those they had sworn to forefend. Yet even that most haunting of horrors slipped away with the coming of the calendar. Memory and imagination conspired to crowd the hours with an elemental joy.

First, I recalled a passage about Dean Stanley and Izaak Walton in Laurence Hutton's "Talks in a Library." The book was close at hand and the place marked:

"Going through the Abbey of Westminster on a very memorable occasion with Miss Mary Anderson and her brother, under the escort of Dean Stanley, the historian of the minster, he showed us a great many rare and curious things which were not contained in his own volume. He stopped before the mural tablet to Isaac Casaubon, in the south transept, and said:

"There is only one bit of desecration of the Abbey that I am disposed to forgive. I'll show it to you." And he laid his beautiful fingers in a caressing way upon the monogram initials 'I. W.', and the date '1658,' which he had discovered to have been scratched there, with a nail, by Isaak Walton himself. This seemed to bring me as near to Walton—always dear to me—as I had ever come. The Dean was kind enough to permit me to have a tracing made of the letters and figures, though such things were against the rules of the institution.

"Isaak Walton had confessed the deed in one of his letters, and the gentle prelate told us that on discovering the fact, late at night, he could not rest till he had proved for himself that the marks still existed. And with a lighted candle he went from the Deanery, in the silent hours of the morning, to satisfy himself that they were still there."

Secondly, and inevitably, I turned to "The Compleat Angler," to the inimitable chapter on 'Trout.' Could anything be more restrained and at the same time more ecstatic than the opening paragraph:

"The trout is a fish highly valued both in this and foreign nations; he may be justly said (as the old poet said of wine, and we English of venison) to be a generous fish; a fish that is so like the buck that he also has his seasons; for it is observed that he comes in and goes out of season with the stag and buck; Gesner says his name is of German offspring, and he says he is a fish that feeds clean and purely in the swiftest streams, and on the hardest gravel; and that he may justly contend with all fresh-water fish, as the mullet may with all sea-fish, for precedence and daintiness of taste, and that being in right season, the most dainty palates have allowed precedence to him."

When an old-school English gentleman brackets anything with wine and venison, he has seen a vision of something as near to heaven as eyes may look upon. I held my finger in the book and dreamed of a stream in the northern land, of a gray morning with the sun stabbing sudden shafts through the mists, of a slow-burning fire which crackled and hissed as the moisture fell upon it from the drenched foliage overhead, of smoke that hung low and clung and spread out in leisurely tides, of trout and bacon in the pan sizzling and spitting, and all the world, all of my world, my very own world, wrapped in the aroma of boiling coffee. "O God, let me live until May!" I prayed.

In spite of the "handsome milkmaid, that had not yet attained so much age and wisdom as to load her mind of any fears of many things that will never be (as too many men often do);" in spite of the witchery of the milkmaid's song, "Come live with me, and be my love;" in spite of the lushness of those English pastures and the simple sophistries of honest folk in the days of good Queen Bess; in spite of the moaning wind and the swirling snow outside and the lateness of the hour, I closed the book and dragged out my fishing kit.

Pandora could not have broken up life's stodgy monotone more completely than did my old tackle-box. There were reels, spoons, phantom-minnows, lines, leaders, two long-lost pipes (one I recognized eagerly as a favorite), a jackknife, a little vial of vaseline, a Lake St. John Railroad time-table, and a score of other things as inseparable from the art of the angler as staff and ring are from the historic episcopate. Infinite pains had been spent in their selection; each was the cue to a story full of pure adventure—a story rich in the beauty of placid lakes and turbulent streams, of days when the heart took its fill of pleasure, innocent of anything corroding or coarsening. If life at its sanest could have been expressed in symbols, they were before my eyes. Themes of rapture ran fugue-like through my heart; gray and golden images of hope and joy overlapped and interfused; momentary emotions expanded into epics and epochs; chapters of a glorious pre-existence were reeled off as though a palimpsest had divulged a series of apocalypses.

And my book of flies! This Jenny Lind, when did it last flick through an early purpling mist and freight the creel with the lordliest trophy of the day? That somber Heckle, so forlornly slim and old-maidish, where did it make its last kill? And the faded Montreal, now almost demure, what havoc had it wrought in swift swirling and broken water at the tailings of a pool below a noisy fall? And how phantomlike that White Miller must have settled upon a glassy open reach in the half-light just before nightfall! Each starts an ebb tide of primitive emotions running back into the eternity before men invented mutual interference and called it civilization.

But the Parmachene Belle! It brings back what I have often tried to forget and have always wanted to understand, memories of a trip full of wonder and questioning and strange sadness, and of how I found a sermon in the weirdness of a wild night in the far North.

II

I went to the Lake Edward district quite late in the season. Raleigh had promised to have my guide and outfit in readiness, but upon my arrival I found the Montagnais Indians had gone back to Roberval for the trapping and the half-breeds were already out with the early hunters. The only man around the place was Pete Lefevre, but he showed a great reluctance to accompanying me. Raleigh said he was an excellent guide, having lived for some years on Lake St. John, and was there considered the most skillful and daring canoeist of all who risked the Grand Discharge. It took a full half-day, however, to win his consent, but from the first dip of his paddle I knew him to be an expert. On the portage he was as strong as a bull, carrying incredible packs and swinging up his canoe with careless ease. He was quick-eyed, dignified, unobtrusive, and very taciturn.

We made Grand Bay easily the first afternoon and got some fishing to boot, and I expected to reach Ecarté by the next night. But we started late, broached our canoe badly about noon, and then after leaving Lake Eugene discovered that I had left my duffle bag at Lake Boquette. Pete's face grew more sullen with each delay. The only words he uttered were jerks of praise for the Emma River. He knew a wonderful pool up the river, and this was the only time in the year to fish it. The Emma district contained the only good fly ground south of the divide! The sweetest camp ever seen was up the Emma among the tamaracks! But not one of the reasons for a change of plans commended itself to me. I suggested that we make camp on the little portage between Algonquin and Stanislaus. To my amazement Pete dropped his paddle and exploded in such emphatic and profane protests that I yielded without a word. Still further to my surprise, he drove the canoe quite wide of the bay where the carry begins and on toward the Discharge. It was nearly sundown, and I did not demur. I could pick out a supper of small trout while he made camp near the outlet of Stanislaus.

After supper, as we smoked by the friendship fire, I thought I caught an unusual furtiveness in his eyes and a note of uneasiness in his voice. He was fussy about the fire, too. It was rather an unpleasant night, black, gusty, and showery, with far-away thunder billowing over the intervening hills. Pete went to the edge of the lake, picked up the canoe and laid it across the opening through the brush as if to bar any approach from that quarter; behind us the timber was big and the undergrowth heavy. As the evening wore on the guide's uneasiness became more marked; he built up the fire repeatedly. Finally I drew him with banter.

During the past few months he had been lumbering in Maine. "Oh, fie, Pete, to prefer the Yankee girls to the Canadian!"

"No, M'sieur, it was not that," and he shook his head with solemn emphasis. "Not that!"

"Ah, then there is more money in Maine than in Quebec!" But he protested so sadly that I was compelled to respect his reserve. After a while he said that he would tell me his story if I would not laugh at him or call him a fool or think him a coward. Of course I would not; nor do I even now.

"M'sieur, it was on the down run of la petite portage from Stanislaus to A'gonquin. I was coming through alone, and light, from the Bostonnais. It was just when the tree shadows hit your face and then lay a long way back on the trail behind you. All at once I have a tight breathing and a moving heart; then, very sudden, a big bull caribou filled up the trail and his head down like as if he would charge. I tried to throw the canoe over between us, and then, mon Dieu, that bull caribou, he speak. Oui, M'sieur, real words. My knees hit together fast; my feet they cold dead and I not move. I just listen, and sweat, and freeze. He say, 'Pete Lefevre, hark!'

"Jesu, the Son God of the Blessed Virgin, he talk to you now with anger all heart blood. Why not you be all man and go fight the hell-whelps? The Huns spit in the face of Jesu, the Son God, again—again they gash open his body—they pull down the holy crucifix—they make mock of the Holy Father in Rome—they feed holy bread to horses—they foul the holy sisters with their beast bodies—they warm their cold feet in the hot bowels of children. Pete Lefevre, why you not all man and fight the hell-whelps for Jesu, the Son God?"

Pete shuddered as he finished; perspiration stood out all over his face; he bowed his head to his knees. I threw wood and still more wood onto the fire. Everything grew suddenly weird—the swish of the water on the undergrowth by the margin of the lake, the pattering of rain on the foliage, the sentinel straightness of the tall black trees, the muffled waves of distant thunder. Had it not been for the cheerfulness of the fire I should have cried out myself, so great was the sense of mystery and fear. But the silence could not continue long or we should both have been unmanned.

To my surprise Pete first broke the silence—

"M'sieu, they would not let me fight the hell-whelps."

"Do you mean they would not take you into the army?"

"Oui, M'sieur, I tried, but the doctor hearken to my heart and say, 'No.'"

"But I thought you were as strong as a giant. No one with heart trouble could drive a canoe and carry the packs as you do."

"Not now, M'sieur; heart beat even now. But that night, after the bull caribou, he speak for Jesu, the Son God, I went sick at Raleigh's place, vera, vera sick, and talk foolish and shout, for weeks, M'sieur. 'Fever typhoid,' Raleigh tell me after."

"Pete, did you ever confess it?"

"Oui, M'sieur—in Maine."

"But why did you go to Maine, Pete?"

"Money, M'sieur, money, for the Blessed Virgin at Roberval, because they would not let me kill the hell-whelps."

So we pulled our blankets around our shoulders and sat by the fire all night, while the thunder crept nearer and passed booming overhead, and I talked of many things in many lands, but always of pleasant incidents and propitious events, until morning came with a deepening crimson flush and drove the terror out of Pete's eyes, but still left the fear in his heart.

The expedition could not continue; even in the daylight the region was a haunted one to the half-breed. For an hour or more, while he broke camp, I fished the Discharge with a leader and a single fly—the Parmachene Belle. Trout rose freely and fought gamely, the sun slashed the boiling water almost horizontally and threw many a miniature rainbow onto the spray, a slight breeze brought the scent of balsam from the woods, a big frog bangoed somewhere behind me and a mink came to the edge of the stream and looked at me with an air of expostulation. And all the while I thought of Pete and tried to grasp a half-familiar passage of the Bible which reflected the tragedy of his experience. Then we embarked; of course we could not go back across la petite portage between Stanislaus and Algonquin, so we struck the long trail by the Vermilion River and over the two-mile carry to Lake Edward.

III

Remember, it is still New Year's Day, in a brick-built city, with the snow swirling outside, and the art calendar on the table and the curled leader with the single Parmachene Belle in my hand. Memory has brought back the questioning and the wondering of the sun-flooded morning after the night of weird fear, when I fished the Discharge from Stanislaus and searched vainly for the word of Scripture which should set Pete's personal replica of the inferno into its rightful place as a detail of spiritual psychology. Subconsciously, during the past few months a sermon had grown in my soul—all real sermons grow in the preacher's soul and are not built in the minister's mind, as most people suppose—but I needed a text. The Parmachene Belle was really the text, but a clergyman in a Geneva gown can hardly hold up a trout fly before a discriminating city congregation and hang a homily upon its hidden hook. Of course the text came, as all things return which have once made even the slightest etching of truth upon the consciousness; it forced its way from the days of ancient Isaiah through the confusion of the intervening centuries as if to prove the essential oneness of human experience:

"He heweth him down cedars. . . . He burneth part thereof in the fire; with part thereof he eateth flesh; he roasteth roast, and is satisfied; yea, he warmeth himself, and saith, Aha, I am warm, I have seen the fire: and the residue thereof he maketh a god."

Across the seas, across the years, the Lebanon and the Laurentians have grasped hands. Isaiah knew the primitive man and the primeval forest. The swing of the ax, the blazing, crackling logs, the prey of the trap cooking on the green-stick spit, the grateful heat in the chilly air; then the fear as night falls—the invisible, intangible foe against which forged weapons are useless, the creeping flesh, the agitated hands, the affrighted mind, the uncontrollable nerves, the anxious searchings of the conscience standing naked before the improvised bar of judgment; and, at last, the desperate resort to religion—a few trembling strokes upon the residue of the tree and he rounds a head, indents a neck, slices an acute triangle for the feet, makes black marks with a charred stick for the eyes and nose and mouth, invests it with supernatural powers, and calls the expedient a god. Primitive and grotesque, yes; but savagery and civilization are alike.

If Isaiah's primitive man had chosen the best portion of his tree for his deity, if he had made his god before he made his camp and cooked his food and warmed his feet, he would have been a saint, a primeval saint and without a halo, nevertheless a spiritual genius.

But when religion is only an expedient to quiet fear, a penitent postscript to correct the text of life's chronicle, a palsied codical to undo the foolish willing of years of perversity, a make-weight to offset decades of waste, a scenic shift to give legitimacy to the next and last act, it is hardly more than a clumsy superstition licensed under the seal of a current orthodoxy. Religion as the fag-end, the salvage squad, the afterthought economy of the residue—well, what is it but bribing the court after the verdict of guilty has been duly rendered?

The snow swirled outside, the hour of midnight struck, the art calendar was propped up on the table, and I stroked the Parmachene Belle as it dropped from the leader.

"You have told me so much to-night," I said to the fly, "tell me more; tell me, what is religion?"

And it seemed as if the Parmachene Belle spoke to me, quietly and reflectively:

"I know nothing of religion. All I know is of glad days in the far-away land, where the birds sing blithely in the morning, and the voice of many waters is sweeter than any angel chorus, and the sunlight filters through the new foliage and falls on the stream like golden filigree, and the air comes down from the hills and fills the lungs like the breath of the gods, and the flowers never grow tired of scattering incense far and wide, and every aisle of the forest is more stately than any columned cathedral ever built by human skill, and not a bird or insect or creature is sad or angry or sulky, and the heart of man has found again all the love and hope and peace and joy which it had lost in the grim city, and the Great Spirit presses close upon the soul with a gentle weight of kindness, and all the fear of hunger and failure and artificial shame have passed away completely, and the fisherman stands in the stream and lifts his voice in a shout of happiness which makes the roaring of the stream seem only a murmuring obligato—that is all I know."

"But that is religion," I said to the Parmachene Belle; "at least, it is religion as people ought to know it to-day: life free from cringing and groveling fear, the mind unconstrained and the heart unclouded, everything that is best in man singing in unison with everything that is best in nature, happiness as an inalienable right and a perpetual franchise, a glad offering of one's utmost in an uncompelled oblation. I shall put that in my sermon as a glowing contrast to Isaiah's primitive man working out his religion of the residue under the lash of terror." Digitized by Google

A SUMMER'S PRELUDE

BY JULIA M. SLOANE

"HAD you thought of anywhere you'd like to go next summer?" asks J—, usually about the time we would be poring over seed catalogues if there were the slightest chance of our ever staying anywhere long enough to pick the flowers when they bloomed. Anyway, flowers we plant very rarely come up—I don't know why. Once we planted piazza boxes with mignonette, guarded them with netting from marauding birds, and were rewarded by some straggling petunias—"volunteers," the weekly gardener called them. That was in California, and I am quite sure that nothing would even "volunteer" for us in a less impulsive climate.

But to return to the summer question. Winter for us is predestined, but summer smacks of free will, though it isn't quite that either, because our daily bread seems always to be baked in a place too hot for babies after June 1. The one thing we are always sure of is that we don't want to go to the place where we were the preceding summer. One trip abroad with a nine-months-old Billie, who had measles in a six-by-six North German Lloyd cabin all the way home, decided us against foreign travel for a time. Recurrent ptomaine poisoning at an expensive hotel in the mountains the following season was equally discouraging; and, last, a secluded spot, forgotten even in New England, where a grove and waterfall all our own would have made a perfect setting for "Lucia," but where no cook would take the part allotted to her in our "Sextette," extinguished our enthusiasm for the "simple life."

The arrival that autumn of the Fat Baby further complicated the situation. However, hope is a stubborn india-rubber sort of thing, and when the usual February question came I was as optimistic as ever. We have a friend—I think I am safe in saying that we still have him in spite of what follows—who is the image of Tenniel's White Knight in "Alice in Wonderland," the one with the mouse-traps and carrots, just pitching forward in his saddle. He owned a house in D—, New Hampshire, which he had long felt would be an ideal summer place for us. Being a bachelor, he was a trifle vague about details, but my main impression from his silver-tongued oratory was that the beauty of the view from the cottage piazza more than repaid the happy tenant for pumping all the water by hand from a skimpy well. We had always heard of the charms of D—, with its colony of painters and writers, and, feeling pumping to be good exercise, by Easter the White Knight had us fairly caught. By the end of May everything packable and cratable was ready for storing till autumn, for J— had a better position offered him, and this was more than the usual summer migration. At last, after passing through all the stages of decomposition—the paper-napkin finish filling J— with unspeakable disgust—we stood on the railway platform surrounded by our friends "seeing us off"! It was really worth their while. First J— with all the bags which he could embrace and bristling with as many umbrellas as a cactus has spines; I next with the Fat Baby. I had chosen him in preference to the Walker Gordon milk box, for, though heavier, he has no corners. Next Mary, the large Irish nurse (who would also have preferred the Fat Baby), with the ice-box and shawl-strap. Then, likewise heavily laden, Lizzie, a widow of the United Brethren faith, capabilities unknown, snatched as a last desperate resort, D— being as barren of domestic aid as a mining camp. Last of all, Billie, aged four, manfully lugging Bonci, the canary—the only really care-free member of the party.

Some one had pinned a bunch of orchids on a small portion of my person not occupied by the Fat Baby. This I bitterly regretted before our journey's end, as orchids create a false impression not borne out by our pocketbook. At the last moment the leading druggist arrived with a scarlet box of chocolates ornamented by silver "kewpies." I feared I might have to carry this touching tribute in my teeth, but J— finally found an empty pocket. Thus we started on what is, I think, a fair specimen of our summer adventures. I have not mentioned one member of the party because at first I did not know she was with us. I refer to the family jinx. Just where we acquired her and how long she is going to stay are points about which we differ. I hope that after seven years from the time we broke a looking-glass she may take herself off. The Irish nurse sides with me, but J— isn't sure. He thinks she likes us, and he says that they have constitutions of iron and no tact.

J— stowed us, bag and baggage, into an express train en route for the Fall River boat while he went back to wind up his year's work. No use to dwell on our transports—not of joy but of baggage and babies. Eventually we found ourselves settled on the boat—next the fog-horn. These objects are not depicted on steamer charts any more than the pillars behind which we so often dodge at a theater. Naturally we had fog, and of course the Fat Baby did not care for the horn. Night became a crescendo duet between them. Towards dawn quiet came, which decoyed us into a little ill-timed sleep. I awoke with a start to realize that we had but half an hour to catch our train. After dressing Billie with fireman-like agility, I went next door to collect the party. The Irish nurse was telling beads, the United Brethren Lizzie was also praying, the Fat Baby was sleeping in his nightgown, and nothing was packed! I said a few things not contained in the Book of Common Prayer, dressed the baby, and just succeeded in getting my family and belongings off the boat and deposited into the last seats of the last car as the train drew out of Fall River. At that moment the bottom dropped out of Bonci's cage. If Bonci had welcomed liberty, I should not have moved a finger to catch him. However, he only clung in terror to his swing, and it simply resulted in our sitting in scattered bird-seed till we reached Boston.

The White Knight had not pointed out to me that the date of our arrival in that city fell on Bunker Hill Day. I suppose he thought that every one knew it; but I come from Rhode Island, where we have other things to think about. Trains were so late that our long-delayed breakfast was only a sketch after all, for the city had to be crossed before we were at last on the one and only train for D—. To heat the Fat Baby's bottle and buy a Bunker Hill Day balloon for Billie pressed me a bit, but I made it with about the same margin as at Fall River.

The Fat Baby enjoyed the trip. He sprawled comfortably on a full seat while Bunker Hill excursionists perched on arms and looked acidly at me. They didn't know what I had lived through since dawn or they would never have expected me to hold that fat little person for hours.

As we drew near D— I began to have those creeping misgivings (localized in the pit of the stomach) that usually assail a perfect stranger—a sort of "about to know the worst" feeling. When we were actually in the stage, bumping along a lovely shaded road, I ventured a few questions to the driver.

Yes, he knew the house.

No, he couldn't rightly say he'd seen any one working about there just lately, but he guessed it would be all right if they knew I was coming.

Something in his tone added to my rising disquiet. At last we drew up by the cottage which we had never seen but of which we had heard so much. The view was all there and quite up to specifications, but for the rest—my heart sinks again in retrospect. The rooms had the feeling of a place long closed and not thoroughly aired. I think now that it probably had been a near thing to get a fire burning in the kitchen stove before the stage turned the corner!

The White Knight had insisted on my using his linen and not bothering to bring any of our own, so our first move, after leaving the baby to have his nap out, like a kitten, on an old quilt on the warm piazza, with Billie not too proud to join him, was to look for bedding. Not even one pillow-case rewarded our efforts, though we searched every corner except a beautiful old Dutch marriage chest, which resisted all our efforts with real Dutch stolidity. A neighborly cleaning woman lent us a few sheets, and for the rest we used paper napkins and the Fat Baby's lingerie. Later by telegraphing we discovered that the White Knight's sister had taken the key to the Maine woods with her (it was similar to the key of the Bastille, which I once saw in a museum), so it was a full week before it could be retrieved by express!

We found ourselves two miles from town, with no neighbors, it being early for summer people, and we had only the very polite, almost exquisite grocer to depend on for the necessities of life. A telephone I could not seem to get, though I coaxed and stormed by turns. The exquisite grocer gently tried to calm me. He said that the British Ambassador had just arrived, and that every one was working for him.

I said I had taken a dislike to the British Ambassador without even seeing him!

He assured me that he was delightful and that I must not be hasty.

I think if the grocer had had a sense of humor it would have helped, for the United Brethren Lizzie was as solemn as an owl and Mary couldn't bear to have me even hum "The Harp that Once through Tara's Halls." All by myself I had to find it funny.

The climax came at the end of the first week. Billie and I came back from a little drive to find water backing up in the kitchen sink and Lizzie throwing her arms about wildly. She said that she came of a nervous family subject to spasms.

"You aren't going to have one now, anyway!" I said.

"What shall we do?" she wailed.

"I will get a plumber at once," I firmly replied.

Now D— consists of only two rival grocery stores and a post office, and the nearest plumber would be in a town ten miles away, and we had no telephone, thanks to the British Ambassador. All this I knew as well as that it was nearly six o'clock; but I felt that I'd like to get away from possible spasms and think. I started to walk briskly along the lovely but lonely wood road leading towards D— when I heard a sound of wheels, and presently a wagon full of workmen appeared. I stood in the middle of the road, and when they drew up, to avoid running over me, I said, in my most ingratiating tone: "Could it be possible that one of you is a plumber? No one has any idea of how much I want a plumber!"

The nicest-looking one of them all got out of the wagon and smilingly said, "I am." I led him away, and he spent the better part of the ensuing week with us, digging up drain-pipes all over the place. The roots of young fir trees had grown into the joints and clogged them. His name also was Billy—a most pleasant person and a welcome relief from the exquisite grocer. We missed him greatly when the job was done.

So it went till the man of the family arrived, and things smoothed out, as they usually do when he comes. However, I have always stoutly maintained that I had at last got them to a point where they were bound to improve. Literature cites instances of persons evoking nymphs in the heart of the woods, but, so far as I know, I am the only one who ever evoked a plumber!

INDUSTRIAL ATHLETICS

HOW THE SPORTS FOR SOLDIERS AND SAILORS ARE DEVELOPING INTO CIVILIAN ATHLETICS

BY WALTER CAMP

"This war has been the test of us,
And killed some of the best of us,
And made men of the rest of us,
And left no East and West of us!"

IF we are to make the most of the lessons of the war, we must study the facts and apply the conclusions to the immediate conditions confronting us as a Nation. The Americans proved that they could and would fight. America set a higher standard for cleanness in service than had previously been attained. The morale, the high spirit, the cheerfulness, as well as the dogged determination to do the job, were features of the American troops noted by the Allies wherever they went. And these conditions came from the fact that we had a basis upon which to build. That is the basis upon which we are about to erect a greater National structure in the form of industrial athletics.

The American boy is early thrown or drawn into athletic sports. Whether he plays his games in the streets or in the sand lots, on a public playground or at a private school, he soon learns that there is one great sin in the decalogue of youth, and that unforgivable sin is cowardice. He learns that strength and skill make him respected of his fellows, and he learns to strive with might and main for pre-eminence in sports.

Hence we breed courage and ambition. Indulgence in these sports takes the boy and youth out of doors; but it goes much further, for it disciplines the boy, teaches him loyalty, takes the selfishness and conceit out of him, strengthens his muscles, and gives him co-ordination and control.

It brings him in contact with his fellows, inculcates a code of team-work, and speedily convinces him that if he is to excel it can be only through hard work and persistent practice. And these lessons are the very bed-rock principles upon which an efficient army or navy is based.

Then we had to face the things that stop fighters in the mass. We had to deal with disaffection and disease. Homesickness is a well-recognized difficulty in the breaking in of new soldiers, and it often-times leads to many further troubles. All drill and no play will ruin an army or navy just as surely as it will an individual boy; just as surely as will all work and no play affect any man in industrial life.

We therefore transferred the home environment to the camp, the cantonment, and the station. When we first undertook the work, many looked upon it as all mere nonsense, folly that had no part in real fighting preparation. What could football, baseball, boxing, and wrestling avail the man who must march and shoot? But the critics soon found the disease rate lowered, the morale greatly improved, and the direct efficiency with gun, grenade, or bayonet startlingly high.

Did not Kipling write:

"And the life we live and know—

Let the fellow sing o' the little things he cares about,

If a fellow fights for the little things he cares about

With the weight of a single blow!"

These boys had a life they lived and knew and cared about, and they would fight all the better for it.

So in industry a man with the outside interest of athletics will work better. Americanization is more possible for those who come to our shores through the medium of American sport than in almost any other way.

It was not long before these Army and Navy teams were found to be able to hold their own and even defeat civilian and college teams. Then the interest doubled. The enthusiasm spread contagiously. Not only were thousands of already skilled men found in the service, but hitherto unknown men came up or were developed who had never before had a chance to try their mettle. Still another feature was that a man who had passed out of the game into business (for the American gives up his athletics too early) had the chance at twenty-four or twenty-five to take up again the sport he had enjoyed, and he found that he had not forgotten his former skill. But it was not the star team or the star performer upon whom the greatest effort was expended. It was rather upon the spread of athletics throughout the mass, the inter-regimental games, the company contests, the sports with hundreds of men in at a time, that all the athletic directors and instructors were working. It is safe to say that never before in any community were there so many men taking part in sports of all kinds as in the camps, cantonments, and stations where our men were in training. And when they went "Over There" our boys took with them sound bodies and the fighting spirit, and their sports went with them. Many a Frenchman gazed with awe upon American teams playing football. Many took into their hands and felt with horror the "hard-as-rock" baseball with which our men played.

Our boxing was made the basis of bayonet fighting and our baseball arms were adept in learning to throw the grenade. The men who had gone into the opposing football line when their signal came went "over the top" with that same abandon. Those who had made a stand on the last five-yard line in the grim determination of the gridiron field faced the scrimmage of war with the same do-or-die fortitude. Those who had raced on the cinder track and thrown their last efforts into the sprint at the finish were just as "game" when the pathway was a Flanders field or a Château Thierry line. The man who took the big chance on the motor track took the greater chances in the air with the same spirit. The man whose nerves had been tested with "two men on," "one out," and "a run to tie and two to win," stood smiling when the line was thin. Yes, these boys of ours were ready and prepared in a hundred ways, the real purpose of which many had never dreamed.

"There are men, my father, brown and strong,

And they carry a banner of wondrous hue;

With a mighty tread they swing along;
Now I see white stars on a field of blue!"

"Hasten, son, fling the window wide;
Let me kiss the staff the flag swings from
And salute the Stars and Stripes with pride,
For, God be praised, the Americans come!"

And now it is over "Over There." Our boys are coming back by the hundreds of thousands. And the great majority of them are wonderfully improved in health and physique and have a broader outlook upon life. Shall we miss the lesson? Remember that in the draft nearly thirty per cent were rejected. That thirty per cent is still with us. They did not share the benefits of all this which the seventy per cent enjoyed. We must make them fit as well, and at the same time must capitalize the asset of health in those returning. Nor is it the physical side alone. The cleanness of the men in our service has shown what may be done for the entire population. It was accomplished in the service by the methods outlined, and it may be accomplished in the civilian population in a similar way.

But there is another phase to be considered, and that, too, one of the greatest importance to all communities. A community is like an army. If it has teamwork, high morale, it is successful and a good place in which to live. If it is merely a place where men work all day long, drag themselves to bed only to secure enough sleep to go through the dreary round of toil again, with nothing in the way of pleasure, nothing to look forward to, that community loses its morale, and just as the individuals lose in their spirit so does the product of that community fall off. Bad feeling, dissension, general low spirits, and, coincident with this, disease and inefficiency, sap its very life-blood. Dr. William Draper Lewis, of the State Health Insurance Commission of the State of Pennsylvania, shows that sickness of workers in that State alone results annually in the loss of 16,800,000 working days, that 120,000 employees in Pennsylvania are sick every day in the year, and that the loss to wage-earners annually is $33,000,000.

As the Allied commands have seen the effectiveness of these sports of ours in making fit men and the establishment of a high morale, they have begun to introduce them in their own military system. Even the Orient is taking up our sports, and that, too, with a definite purpose. If all these things were good for men preparing for service and in service, it is certainly of the greatest importance that they be continued and extended throughout the land. They should go into our entire industrial fabric.

General Pershing writes: "I am now most anxious to encourage in every way possible the athletic side of our training, both as a means of keeping the personnel wholesomely and enjoyably occupied during the periods not needed for other military duties and as a means of keeping them in the state of physical and mental fitness which is so necessary to the morale which breeds contentment."

In fact, Great Britain is already realizing this, and a conference of associations representing all sports of the United Kingdom, held in London, has approved of a series of memorials to be forwarded to every member of the Cabinet and the House of Commons emphasizing the need for increased facilities for sports and recreations for workers, not merely to improve the health of the nation, but as tending to reduce unrest.

The memorial also points out that hundreds of thousands of additional players who took up sport while serving in the army must be provided for.

The conference suggests that the Government acquire ground for the practice of sports and let it at low rentals, and also instruct and empower municipalities to do likewise. The Government is also asked to restore the pre-war cheap railway fares for players and to exempt non-profit-making grounds from taxes.

A factory of ten thousand hands can be organized just as we organized a naval station. Each man in service had his particular job of navy work to do, just as the factory worker has his allotted task; but through organization it was possible to provide sports, athletics, recreation, relaxation of a wholesome character, and to give every man something to which he could look forward with anticipation of enjoyment. All this should be transferred into industry, for two reasons. First, that these men who come back physically fit shall not deteriorate in that great asset, health. And, secondly, that the thousands who had none of these benefits should have the opportunity not only to become strong and well, but to enjoy that possession in every way.

One of the most telling criticisms that has been offered in the last twenty years against college athletics was based upon the fact that the college athlete, having made himself physically fit and muscularly strong, having trained and worked out of doors, had built up a condition that required exercise and out of doors for the continuance of health. Immediately after graduation he plunged into his life's work, which, with the usual American ambition, he took so seriously as to neglect everything in the way of physical exercise for two or three years, and consequently he broke down. If one stops to realize what it means, therefore, for these men of ours who have had two years of vigorous outdoor life and training to come back and go into the factories, he must see that, unless some opportunity along the lines of athletics and sports is provided, these men too will suffer breakdowns in health which will be tremendously expensive not only to the men themselves but to the communities, and finally to the entire productivity of the country.

There is another important phase to this subject, and that is one which is extremely pressing. How are we to fill the place formerly occupied by the saloon? It should be borne in mind that there were thousands of men who used the saloon as a social club. They did not go there especially for the purpose of drinking. They went there on account of the "gang" spirit, and because human nature is gregarious. Now it is a recognizable fact that these saloons were not maintained for philanthropic motives. It was the profit on the sales which paid the rent and gave men a place to sit and talk. Here is a chain of social clubs all over the country which under the Prohibition Act must inevitably go out of operation, at any rate in the form in which they have been conducted. Men drifted into these clubs or saloons just as they came from work. There were no signs up, "No smoking allowed," and there were no rules which provided that a man should go home first and dress up before he went to the saloon. These are things that must be reckoned with, and they are a part of the social state. Two million soldiers who are returning and the millions and millions of workers in this country are not looking for philanthropy. Men never felt when they dropped into a saloon that they were sponging on charity or that they were not paying their own way. Hence when we study the replacement of these we see that it must be done by the men themselves. The Government did not order the men in service to play games. They provided some of the facilities, but wherever there was a competent director in a station it meant that he organized committees who "ran things." And that is the way it must be worked out in industrial life. The management can help, but the men themselves are the ones to organize, that they may be independent and take part in programmes of their own creating.

BY JEAN RUSHMORE PATTERSON

You ceased to be a woman when you spoke
And bade us strive to understand ;
You were the peasant that had borne the yoke,
You were the people of your native land !

The exile, hoping through the endless years,
The murdered child, the soldier dead,
The widow, sorrowing too deep for tears,
The starving orphan crying out for bread !

You were the downcast striving to be free,
The bondaged souls that ask a right,
Unlettered thousands making earnest plea,
The long oppressed at last demanding light !

The very soul of Russia standing there,
Incarnate will, despite the woe ;
Having borne much, yet struggling still to bear,
You bade us not forget the debt we owe,

The bitter months when countless Russians tried
Unarmed to stand the bloody test,
The marshy plains with Russian blood deep dyed,
The Eastern front that helped to save the West !

You were no woman when you pleaded thus,
You were the Russian people calling us !

MORE ABOUT THE NEW INCOME TAX IN NEW YORK

BY FREDERICK M. DAVENPORT

Mr. Davenport was Chairman of the Special Tax Committee which drew the Income Tax Bill for the State of New York. The bill had the unanimous approval of the men of both parties on the Committee, and was passed with the vote of every member of the Legislature in both branches and signed by the Governor. Apropos of Senator Davenport's statement concerning the need of a budget system in this country, our readers will find on another page an article describing the method used in Great Britain. We have already announced for a subsequent issue an article by Senator Davenport giving his impressions of the Legislature of which he is a member.—THE EDITORS.

IT may be interesting to the readers of The Outlook to know that the rather rigorous criticism of the new Income Tax Law in New York which very recently appeared in its editorial columns has at one point the warm approval of those who drew the measure. I refer to the urgent need of checking waste and extravagance in State and municipal as well as National Governments, and also of checking uncontrolled public expenditure itself, which is not directly wasteful, but which is going forward by leaps and bounds in all parts of the Union. I will return to this point in a moment.

The criticisms by The Outlook relate partly to certain alleged minor injustices of the law to non-residents of the State, but chiefly to the alleged faulty method setting about to increase cash receipts of before reorganizing the State's finances.

First, I will try to make clear what is the reason for and the trouble with the provision which seems to make the law bear somewhat unjustly upon non-residents. In the case of residents the tax is imposed upon the entire income from whatever source derived, whether within or without the State, and a minimum exemption is allowed of $1,000 for a single person and $2,000, with $200 additional for each of certain dependents, for a married person. In the case of non-residents the tax is imposed only upon such income as is received or earned within the State of New York, and no minimum exemption is allowed. The theory was that if you tax a resident on his whole income from whatever source derived you should not tax the minimum of subsistence for himself and his family. But if you are taxing, as in the case of the non-resident, only the income earned within the State of New York, and not by any means necessarily all of a person's income, it is not fair to allow him the advantage of deducting the whole minimum of subsistence, as you do in the case of the resident, who pays tax on his whole income from whatever source derived, inside or outside the State. If, however, it could be shown to the satisfaction of the New York authorities that the entire income of the non-resident taxpayer was received within the State of New York, and that no claim for the

$1,000 or $2,000 exemption, or any part of it, has been made elsewhere, there is no reason in the world why the non-resident should not also enjoy this exemption. Such a solution would be within the spirit of the law. If the Comptroller of the State, who is the collecting agent, follows the spirit of the law, he may provide a form of certificate through which the non-resident taxpayer may make clear that he has no other income than that earned in the State of New York, and thereupon receive the benefit of the minimum provision, as in the case of the resident. If the Comptroller is hesitant about violating the letter of the act, the intent of the framers can be made clear in January by a few words of amendment several months before the tax, in any event, can be put into operation. The time for the first payment of the tax is March 15, 1920.

There is another slight unclearness in the act which might conceivably bear unfavorably upon non-residents, but which actually will not. Under the measure, the employer or the institution in the State of New York paying the salary or the earning to the non-resident is made the responsible withholding agent for the amount of the tax if the tax is not paid by the non-resident himself. The rate in the bill was first fixed at a flat 2 per cent for everybody, and 2 per cent would then have been the amount which the withholding agent would be responsible for deducting from the salary or earning. But at the last moment a graduated rate of 1 per cent up to $10,000, 2 per cent up to $50,000, and 3 per cent above that was determined upon, but by inadvertence no change was made in the provision about the responsibility of the withholding agent, and so the act as passed seems to make the withholding agent responsible for deducting 2 per cent on a person's income of $10,000, whereas the tax was finally fixed at only 1 per cent. But if the non-resident pays directly his tax of 1 per cent, no trouble would arise from this minor error, as the withholding agent would then be free from all responsibility under the terms of the act. And of course this inadvertence also will be corrected early in the next legislative session, some months before the law goes into operation. And in the meantime the Comptroller may, if he wishes, prepare his preliminary form of certificate in line with the amendment that is certain to be made. And the intent of the law is so clear upon this matter that I have no doubt the courts would hold, in any event, that the withholding agent is responsible only up to 1 per cent in case of incomes under $10,000.

When we consider also that in order to secure exact justice a reciprocal provision is introduced into the act providing that non-residents shall have rebated to them any tax on New York income which may be imposed by the State of the taxpayer's residence, providing that his home State treats New Yorkers in a substantially similar way; and when we consider that the non-resident in the meantime owes the Government of the State of New York something for the benefit to him of the legal and social and physical protection and opportunity offered to him to accumulate wealth and do business and make earnings in the State, it seems to me that the objection about the non-resident is pretty effectually disposed of.

The inevitable result of American methods of legislation, with its practice of frequently making important changes at the last moment, is the creeping in of occasional minor inconsistencies. But a broad view of the situation will, I think, compel the conclusion that the enactment of this measure, and the important amendment at the same time of the Corporation Tax Act, put New York in the forefront of the movement toward a modern and equitable system of taxation in this country. In no other leading American State has there been taken so long a step toward substituting for the inadequate and unworkable general property tax a system of individual and corporate taxation of high character such as we now have in the State of New York as a result of the action of the Legislature recently adjourned. The system in New York is now superior in important respects to that of Wisconsin, the only other American State which has seriously grappled with the problem. While there remains something yet to be done in improving the system of taxing public utilities, I find that those who are best informed upon taxation in the country recognize that the revision of the tax system recently made by New York marks an epoch in the history of American finance.

And now as to the chief burden of the criticism by The Outlook, that the substance of the imposition of the tax really puts the cart before the horse, that it is bad procedure to impose an effective income tax, with all its possibilities of increasing the rate and extending the volume of revenue, before adequate effort is made to check wasteful and extravagant and more or less uncontrolled expenditure. Technically this position is correct. Practically it is not.

In the first place, as The Outlook intimates, it was a condition and not a theory which confronted the Legislature. Owing to the modern method of administering certain forms of taxation by the State Government, and then distributing the proceeds between the State and the localities, it has become more and more necessary for States to consider the local and especially the municipal situation in all matters of revenue. As the result of the prospective wiping out of the excise revenues through war-time and Constitutional prohibition, and as the result also of the mounting costs of labor and commodities and personal services growing out of war-price conditions, the State and the municipalities of New York were suddenly confronted with a prospective deficit for the current year of about fifty-three million dollars. Now real estate is heavily burdened already. Personal property has proved itself generally in this country, and especially in the State of New York, a most elusive source of revenue. The so-called indirect taxes, like those upon inheritances and mortgages and motor vehicles, might be made to produce a few extra millions; but all the suggestions together would not begin to produce fifty-three millions. There was only one possible source left to which to turn, and that was income.

Now to continue still to be practical. In private expenditure, and theoretically in any kind of expenditure, the first thing to do would be to check waste and extravagance and begin to shut the sluiceways of financial folly, so far as there is any. But that is not the way it happens in the case of public expenditure. The great difficulty about checking extravagance in commonwealth or nation through the introduction of a thorough budget system is that this reform breaks down the sanctified system of special appropriations for particular districts under the easy method of "you tickle me and I'll tickle you." There is so much good and easy politics in that from the legislator's standpoint that it takes something more than the statesmanship of financial idealism to alter it. It begins to be altered only when the taxpayer himself for the first time begins directly to feel the pinch of it, and that is precisely what happens when the direct and personal income tax is laid upon the citizen. The Congress of the United States seems to be about to establish a National budget system to check the flow of uncontrolled extravagance, but that prospectively happy issue out of our afflictions might not have come for a generation—it has already been talked about for a generation—if it had not been for the direct pressure and burden of the Federal income tax upon the citizen. Now something will no doubt be done about it.

The same thing, in my opinion, will happen in the States as they adopt the direct income tax and push the pressure of it down to reach justly as many persons as possible. The demand for a thorough State and municipal budget system and the control of expenditure in a vigorous fashion will then grow by leaps and bounds. And I can see no other practical way. So, instead of its being haphazard financial procedure to impose a State income tax before expenditure is checked, as The Outlook seems to think, I regard it as the most direct, designed, and certain way of beginning to accomplish a greatly to be desired end.

In fact, it has long seemed to me that the direct personal income tax is particularly needed by the separate commonwealths of the Union, not only as a means of financial reinvigoration, but as a means of obtaining in the States a more sensitive and critical citizenship. The tide of nationality is running full and strong, and will run stronger; and the eye of the citizen is becoming very critical upon Washington. There would seem to be no need, save in times of emergency, for the employment in any high degree of the income tax by the National Government. The National Government has not yet begun to tap the legitimate indirect sources which are so naturally available for Federal purposes.

If the Government of the country is not to grow top-heavy and topple over, if centralization at Washington is not to become increasingly dangerous to freedom, then something must be done to make the local State governments strong and efficient and to fix the attention of the citizen upon his own commonwealth and its increasingly important function under our Federal system. If free government fails in America, it will be because the State governments fail. My own view is that the best thing which could happen to the financial system of the separate States would be the imitation of the action of New York and the adoption of the income tax principle throughout the commonwealths of the Union. There is no tax which so brings the taxpayer to close quarters with Government revenues and expenditures or so practically brings home to him the responsibility of citizenship.

WEEKLY OUTLINE STUDY OF CURRENT HISTORY

BY J. MADISON GATHANY, A.M.

HOPE STREET HIGH SCHOOL, PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Based on The Outlook of June 4, 1919

Each week an Outline Study of Current History based on the preceding number of The Outlook will be printed for the benefit of current events classes, debating clubs, teachers of history and of English, and the like, and for use in the home and by such individual readers as may desire suggestions in the serious study of current history.—THE EDITORS.

[Those who are using the weekly outline should not attempt to cover the whole of an outline in any one lesson or study. Assign for one lesson selected questions, one or two propositions for discussion, and only such words as are found in the material assigned. Or distribute selected questions among different members of the class or group and have them report their findings to all when assembled. Then have all discuss the questions together.]

I—INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

A. Topic: The Church and Social Reconstruction; A Great Educational Scheme; To Fight Disease and Destitution; The Children's Bureau Conference; The Farmer's Boy and the School.

Reference: Pages 182, 184.

Questions:

1. What are the things the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church urge that the Church favor? Do you think the pulpit should have anything to do with such subjects? Reasons. 2. What are the principles and the spirit of Christ's teachings? If these were applied to modern industry, what changes, in your opinion, would have to take place in the management of industry? 3. Could a person or a corporation that believed in practicing Christian principles conduct a successful modern business? Discuss. 4. State the facts about and then discuss the value of the great educational scheme explained by The Outlook on page 182. 5. What, in your opinion, are the practical, personal, and National moral values in supporting the new League of Red Cross Societies? 6. Tell very briefly your personal opinion of each one of the topics discussed at the Washington conference on child welfare. 7. Discuss at some length the physical, the economic, and the social values of keeping children in school until they are eighteen years of age. 8. Describe and tell the importance of the Juvenile Court, a distinctly American institution. Is not the home really responsible for juvenile offenders? Discuss. 9. Tell why, in your opinion, the United States has never attacked the problem of rural child labor and the lack of schooling that goes with it. Discuss the importance of attacking this problem. 10. In connection with this topic read "The New Citizenship," by A. T. Robertson (Revell), and "Social Problems," by E. T. Towne (Macmillan).

B. Topic: What the Bolsheviks Have Done to Russia; The War's Effect Upon Our Economic Philosophy; America and Russia—A Contrast.

Reference: Pages 193-196; 203-205; 185.

Questions:

Note.—At least three lessons should be devoted to this topic. 1. What is Mr. Carasso's explanation of the "bitter life-and-death struggle between peasant and soviet"? Who comprise the soviets? What are they? 2. Is Bolshevism an anti-religious affair? Reasons. 3. Give a summary of what Dr. Carasso says about Bolshevism and education. What is your explanation of the Bolshevik attitude toward education? 4. Do you think the treatment of the Russian aristocracy by the Bolsheviks justifiable? Tell why or why not. 5. State and discuss what Dr. Carasso believes the world's task with regard to Bolshevism is. 6. Select ten sentences from Mr. Price's article which you consider well worth discussing and explain why you think them worth discussing. 7. What does the expression "the injustices of individualism" mean? Do you believe in "a greater degree of welfare" for common laborers? Reasons. 8. What is a commodity? Is labor such? Discuss at length. 9. The Outlook says: "The Socialism that Mr. Price discusses and the Socialism which the Bolsheviks are practicing are as wide as the poles apart." Show why. 10. Many believe America stands greatly in need of economic reconstruction. Show how this could be effected without revolution. 11. Read three very suggestive books: "Progress and History," by F. S. Marvin (Oxford University Press); "The Economics of Progress," by J. M. Robertson (Dutton); "Reconstruction and National Life," by C. F. Lovell (Macmillan).

II—NATIONAL AFFAIRS

Topic: Stupidity in Property and Politics. Reference: Pages 191-193.

Questions:

1. Judging from what Senator Davenport says, what is the condition of politics in the New York Legislature? Is such a condition peculiar to New York? Proof. 2. To what extent do you think "business interests" control both the economic and the political interests of our country? Discuss. 3. Explain at length the meaning of: "The greatest breeder of Bolshevism and Socialism is blind Bourbonism." Illustrate freely. 4. Senator Davenport believes that had "big business" a decade ago listened to and accepted Mr. Roosevelt and his economic and social convictions, they and America would be much better off to-day. Explain just what Mr. Roosevelt believed in these respects. Do you agree with Mr. Davenport? 5. Read Muzzey's "American History," pages 591-609 (Ginn), and "The Life of Theodore Roosevelt," by W. D. Lewis (Winston).

III—PROPOSITIONS FOR DISCUSSION

(These propositions are suggested directly or indirectly by the subject-matter of The Outlook, but not discussed in it.)

1. Economic and political discontent cannot be cured by force. 2. The end never justifies the means.

IV—VOCABULARY BUILDING

(All of the following words and expressions are found in The Outlook for June 4, 1919. Both before and after looking them up in the dictionary or elsewhere, give their meaning in your own words. The figures in parentheses refer to pages on which the words may be found.)

Christian Socialism (182); a normal home (184); fiasco, perforce, duress, charlatan (194).

One Key does it all

With the Yale Cylinder Master Key System any number of individual Locks—each with its own individual key which will pass that lock and no other—are placed under the control of a single Master Key.

THE Yale Cylinder Master Key gives the responsible director of the modern office building instant and complete control of every lock—on entrance and interior doors; storage compartments; engine rooms; in fact the control of every lock through which the building owners may properly have access.

The convenience, security and economy of a Yale Cylinder Master Key System will be at once apparent to every executive concerned in the maintenance and operation of the modern office building. And whether it is a new building or an enlargement of an established building, in planning a Yale Master Key System provision is made not only for immediate needs, but for future possible extensions.

Our technical staff is at your service for a survey and recommendation for your building. Correspondence is invited if more detailed data will interest you.

Cover Your Investment with a 20-Year Guaranty Bond—

Every one knows that a structure of brick and steel and concrete will endure for a generation and more.

But how about the roof that covers the structure? Frequently that is not only an unknown quantity but a liability rather than an asset.

It is a short-sighted and costly policy to put a poor roof on a good building.

As one of the oldest and largest manufacturers of materials used in constructing roofs, we have done our part to make all roofs good roofs.

Years ago, for that reason, we induced the leading architects and engineers to unite in the adoption of The Barrett Specification as a satisfactory standard specification.

Now we go a step further by sending our Inspectors to check up on the construction, and if they find that The Barrett Specification has been properly complied with, we will, without charge, issue a 20-Year Guaranty Bond exempting the owner from all further expense for repairs or up-keep on that roof for twenty years. This service may be had on all roofs of fifty squares or larger in all towns of 25,000 population or more and in smaller places where our Inspection Service is available.

Our guaranty is a real Surety Bond issued by the U. S. Fidelity and Guaranty company of Baltimore, one of the largest Surety Companies in America. Our only requirements are that The Barrett Specifications dated May 1, 1916, shall be strictly followed and that the roofing contractor shall be approved by us and his work subject to our inspection.

Thus, in spite of the fact that we do not build roofs ourselves, we are put in a position where we can guarantee the delivery of the long years of service which these roofs are capable of giving.

FICTION

Hohenzollerns in America (The). With the Bolsheviks in Berlin and Other Impossibilities. By Stephen Leacock. The John Lane Company, New York.

Some of the slighter and shorter bits of burlesque writing in this collection strike us as more truly humorous than the over-elaborated account of the life of "Uncle William" as a peddler in New York living in tenements with his Hohenzollern tribe.

Nixola of Wall Street. By Felix Grendon. The Century Company, New York.

Nixola is a girl private secretary with large ability and ambition, and with a good deal of a coquette in her personal relations to her employer and other admirers. There is satire on excessive efficiency system in business, on art fads, and on social caste.

Rosy. By Louis Dodge. Illustrated. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

A romance of the Ozark Mountains. The situation is odd, improbable, but also convincing—a young girl conceals for months in the farmhouse where she lives her lonely life or in a cave close by a young man who has fled from the draft. Meanwhile the man whom she loves enlists in the other's name, partly from honest patriotism and partly to escape rearrest for a technical crime he has committed to get even with a scoundrel who has ruined his father. The tale is distinctly well written and grasps the attention strongly.

ESSAYS AND CRITICISM

Chimney-Pot Papers. By Charles S. Brooks. Illustrated. The Yale University Press, New Haven.

A book fair to the eye and pleasant to the mind. The author wins the sympathy of the reader at the start and keeps it in his many excursions in both objective and subjective realms. There is no conscious attempt at "brilliant" writing, and many readers will like the book all the better for this.

BIOGRAPHY

Clemenceau: The Man and His Time. By H. M. Hyndman. The Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York.

It is significant of a broader perspective among men that an English Socialist leader should be the sympathetic biographer of one whom French Socialists have long opposed, the present French Premier. Mr. Hyndman's book appears at the right time. In a note to his biographer, Clemenceau says:

I have nothing to say about myself, except that I am doing my best, with the feeling that it will never be enough. . . . In so vast a drama, my dear friend, my personality does not count. . . . I ask only to see the day of the great victory.

To that day Clemenceau has certainly contributed as much as any one. But the victory will not have been wholly won unless that part of Clemenceau's work—the assuring to France of safeguards against future attack—is established. One needs to be on the ground to realize how absolutely necessary these safeguards are. Mr. Hyndman describes the great Frenchman at many critical stages in his life, and the description is no unqualified panegyric; it is that of a severe critic, who is, paradoxical as it may seem, also an honest admirer. The book shows Clemenceau as liable to make the mistakes due to one of his temperament. But it also shows him in every respect a "stalwart." No matter what Clemenceau may say in disparagement of his personality, it is that very rugged and commanding personality which has not only brought strength to France but has also given force to her as a prime factor in the society of nations.

HISTORY, POLITICAL ECONOMY, AND POLITICS
Bismarck. By C. Grant Robertson, M.A., C.V.O. Makers of the Nineteenth Century. Edited by Basil Williams. Henry Holt & Co., New York.

Of the making of books about Bismarck there seems to be no end. Many students of German history already have a shelf full of works on Bismarck—biographies and studies concerning the Iron Chancellor's influence. It would seem as if this shelf-full were enough for any student, yet the present volume, coming when one is viewing the wreck of Bismarck's Empire, has a perspective denied to its predecessors.

Democracy in Reconstruction. Edited by Frederick A. Cleveland and Joseph Schafer. Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston.

The somewhat colorless title of this book ought not to restrict its circulation. It contains living, vital discussions of the questions that now confront the world, and may be regarded as essential to all students of reconstruction problems.

Era of the Civil War (The), 1848-1870. By Arthur Charles Cole. The Centennial History of Illinois. Vol. III. Illustrated. Illinois Centennial Commission, Springfield.

A period of great interest in the development of one of our greatest States is succinctly and comprehensively described in this book. Numerous illustrations enliven its pages.

Experiments in International Administration. By Francis Bowes Sayre. Harper & Brothers, New York.

Mr. Sayre traces the development of the idea of a League of Nations through the centuries, in which the brotherhood of mankind has often been but an empty phrase; now, however, it "may be given a structure of force and reality," for international co-operation has become a necessity. The principal reason for the failure of previous attempts at international administration is, in the author's opinion, because treaties have been written in the interest of rulers rather than of peoples, and because "nations have been unwilling to submit to a sufficient amount of external control to make an effective international executive organ possible." "If the treaty of 1919," he says, "is to succeed where others have failed, it must be founded upon the broad interest of peoples," not upon "the narrow ambition and selfish interest of triumphant governments;" moreover, some guaranty must be found "more effective than mere words to make secure the keeping of peace."

WAR BOOKS

Dramatic Story of Old Glory (The). By Samuel Abbott. Foreword by James M. Beck. Illustrated. Boni & Liveright, New York.

How the American flag was devised, developed, and carried over the continent and the world—how it received the name "Old Glory"—how it has maintained its reputation in the world war—all this, with much other relevant information, is here made into a lively and interesting book. Such a story, it would seem, ought to have been further enlivened with color pictures of the flag's evolution.

THE NATION'S INDUSTRIAL PROGRESS

Believing that the advance of business is a subject of vital interest and importance, The Outlook will present under the above heading frequent discussions of subjects of industrial and commercial interest. This department will include paragraphs of timely interest and articles of educational value dealing with the industrial upbuilding of the Nation. Comment and suggestions are invited.

THE PISTOL AND THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE AMERICAN REVOLVER

This article is designed to give a brief review of small firearms, and supplements two articles on "The Story of Firearms" which appeared in The Outlook in the issues of September 11 and 18, 1918.

THE term "revolver" is employed so generally in this country, and the real American army revolver has played so important a rôle in our history, that the word is frequently confused with the more comprehensive and accurate term "pistol." Strictly speaking, the word "revolver" merely describes that form of multi-shot pistol which carries its cartridges in a rotary cylinder. In the service the revolver is generally called "pistol," and in the South, where the weapon is used much, the word "pistol" has usually been applied to it by the men who know it best. In the West the revolver has various designations, such as "gun," "six-gun," "six-shooter," "smoke-wagon," etc. We shall therefore use the term "pistol" throughout this article, except where the word "revolver" particularly applies.

Pistols are understood to have been made for the first time at Pistoia, Italy, whence they receive the name. Caminello Vitelli is the accredited inventor, who flourished about the middle of the sixteenth century. It is also claimed, however, that the Germans possessed small arms several decades previously. The Italian pistol had a short barrel and a heavy, clumsy butt surmounted by enormous balls or caps. The earliest pistols were of the wheel-lock type. Then came the flint-lock variety, about 1630, and this type was in common use for more than two centuries. Flint-lock pistols fell into three main groups: first, horse pistols, embracing all large varieties; second, dueling pistols; and, third, pocket pistols.

Dueling pistols were most accurately made and were considered deadly at twenty paces. These represent some of the finest specimens of the gunmaker's art. These early pistols were finished to suit the social order of the age—exquisite works of art for the nobility; plain but graceful and reliable weapons for the gentry; and coarse but efficient equipment for the middle and lower classes. Dueling was much in vogue in Europe in the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, and played a part in our own early history. Every one recalls the tragic death of Alexander Hamilton at the hand of Aaron Burr. Another famous early American duel was between Stephen Decatur and Commodore James Barron in 1820, which resulted in Decatur's death. But dueling came into disfavor and was ultimately forbidden by law.

The reign of George III (1760-1820) saw the culmination of the flint-lock period and the beginning of the percussion era. It was during this period that English gunsmiths attained world-wide celebrity for the excellence of their weapons.

TYPES OF "GUNS" USED IN THE PIONEER DAYS IN THE WEST

The first shot of the Revolutionary War, which provoked the skirmish of Lexington, was fired by Major Pitcairn at Captain Parker's men from an old Highlander flint-lock pistol. A few hours after he fired the momentous shot he fell wounded from his saddle, and his horse galloped into the American lines bearing his pistols. These were carried during the war by General Putnam, and are now the property of the town of Lexington.

The principle of a revolving breech to one barrel is very old and was employed on the ancient hand cannon. In the ancient type the chamber was moved around by hand, while in the modern weapon it is geared to other mechanism and is automatically rotated when the hammer is raised or the trigger pulled.

The percussion principle was patented in 1807. In the battle of Waterloo both flint-lock and percussion weapons were in use, but the percussion pieces were the personal property of the officers who carried them.

In 1814 a self-acting revolver mechanism of a crude pattern was produced and a separate spring was used to rotate the chamber. Early in the last century a crude form of revolver called the "pepper-box" was widely manufactured. This resembled a revolver without a barrel, the hammer being placed either above or below the chamber, and the pulling of the trigger rotated this chamber and also cocked and fired the weapon.

Thus it possessed the trigger action of the modern double-action revolver. The early American revolvers were single-action; that is, the trigger was used only to fire the weapon.

Despite the claims of European inventors, there is no doubt that the revolver in all its best applications is the outcome of American ingenuity and workmanship, and it may well be termed the National weapon. Charles W. Sawyer, a leading authority on firearms, says:

The revolver is distinctly an American weapon in invention, development, and service. Symbolically, it should occupy a niche of honor, for it stands for invention, the extension of territory, the suppression of lawlessness, the influx of wealth, and, in general, for power. In the progress of nations, and particularly in the tremendous strides of the United States, it has performed a remarkable service.

The inventor of the first real revolver, from which all later models have been developed, was Colonel Samuel Colt. While a mere lad, Colt, in 1827, shipped before the mast for a voyage from Boston to Calcutta. It was on this voyage that he whittled out a wooden model of the revolver which was to play such an important part in American history. Upon his return Colt endeavored to interest his father in his invention, and, failing in this, he went to Europe and took out his first patents in 1835. The next year he returned and took out American patents and succeeded in forming a company to manufacture his new firearm. This did not find favor with army officers, and Colt was greatly disappointed. The first Colt pistols were sold in Texas, which in 1836 won its independence from Mexico. These pistols were used by the cowboys and State militia and became known as the "Texas pistol."

In 1837-8 the Seminole Indian War was raging in Florida. The introduction of Colt's repeating weapons struck terror into the hearts of the Indians, who were used only to single-loaders, and this helped greatly in bringing the war to a successful conclusion.

The following year the captain of the Texas Rangers, named Walker, came to New York for a supply of the latest firearms. He interviewed Colt, and they evolved the first type of heavy military revolver, which became known as the "Walker Pistol." In 1846 the Mexican War broke out and the army officers immediately sought Colt revolvers. The United States Government issued large orders to Colt for these weapons and he began to manufacture a model called the "Old Model Army Pistol." These weapons proved highly efficient, especially at close-range fighting, which the Mexicans then preferred. The issue of these weapons marked the first real recognition by the Government of the revolver as a regulation military arm. The great superiority of the American troops over the Mexicans and their much smaller casualties were largely due to the use of revolvers, while the Mexican firearms were all single-shot. An American officer said afterward: "Those Texas Rangers with Colt revolvers walked right into towns and hamlets of the Mexicans and drove the population out against all resistance. Eighty men with those arms drove five hundred Mexicans before them and killed two hundred and fifty more." The word "Tejano" (Texan) is a synonym in Mexico to this day for a good revolver shot.

After the Mexican War Colt made several trips to Europe, and he read a paper on revolvers before the Institute of Civil Engineers in London. As a result he received enormous orders from the English Government.

In 1849 Edwin Wesson took out a patent for a revolver identical in principle with Colt's but different in appearance and mechanism.

During the Crimean War large orders for American revolvers were placed by both the English and Russian Governments.

At the outbreak of the Civil War revolvers were in general use on both sides. Some troops, notably Mosby's Guerrillas, were armed only with revolvers, two in the belt and two in the saddle holsters. These proved extraordinarily fatal in cavalry conflicts.

In Cuba and the Philippines the revolver also proved its excellence as a military weapon.

The revolver has not only played its part in war, but figures largely in the romance of early American days and in the Western extension of the frontier. The cowboy of the romantic West cherished his "gun" closer than a brother and often it stood between him and sudden death. In 1849 gold was discovered in California and a vast horde of treasure-seekers poured forth into the mining camps. These were made up of all grades of society. Law and order could be maintained only by force, and every man carried his six-shooter and was quick on the trigger. During this period the demand in the West for revolvers almost equaled the total number of inhabitants, for even the women went armed. The reader of Bret Harte is frequently thrilled by "gun-play," and the modern "wild West" movie would often fall flat without the display of the trusty "shooting-iron." We see the strained faces of the gamblers around the card table. A card drops from the sleeve of one of the players—there is a loud report and a smoking, ugly-looking, short-barreled Derringer falls from the pocket of his opponent, whence the shot was fired!

And the old South was full of the romance of the weapon which all gentlemen carried. How easily we picture the old "Southern gentleman," who wore a long black tail-coat, with a pistol in each tail pocket. This was an advantageous garment, for a quick sweep of the coat tail allowed the wearer to fire from the hip with great freedom of action. Brave indeed was the man who dared offer a "gentleman" a gratuitous affront.

The newspaper editors of those early days found it necessary to be as efficient with the "gun" as with the pen. The unwary wielding of the pen often led to the compulsory and sudden drawing of the shooting-iron. For an editor would often offend, and then woe to such a one if he were too slow on the trigger! Such an affair of honor was the famous fight between R. F. Beine, of the Richmond "State," and W. C. Elam, of the "Wing," as late as 1883.

In the last fifty years there have been various changes and improvements made in revolvers and pistols, mainly in the direction of greater rapidity of fire and greater safety in handling. The hammerless revolver was evolved, in which an internal hammer is worked by the pull of the trigger. There is therefore no projecting protuberance to catch in one's clothing and discharge the revolver accidentally. An automatic safety bolt has also been devised which makes accidental discharge absolutely impossible.

Another development is the automatic revolver, in which the principle of utilizing the recoil of each shot to operate the mechanism is applied.

The latest weapon devised, which is notable for its rapidity of fire, is the automatic pistol. It is probable that this type of weapon will ultimately supersede the revolver. It is made with one barrel and a magazine, on the principle of the repeating rifle. With these weapons two Russian Anarchists some years ago were able to defy the entire police force of London and initiate the memorable "siege of Sidney Street"—an affair which necessitated the calling out of the troops and raised such a popular outcry over the insufficient armament of the London police that they were shortly after armed with automatic pistols.

The automatic pistol was part of the regular equipment of United States Army officers in the late European war. These automatics fire seven shots as fast as the trigger can be pulled, and are therefore the most efficient small arms for close fighting that have ever been devised.

In certain States revolvers have fallen somewhat into disrepute because of the operations of gangs of "gunmen," and stringent laws have been passed regulating the sale of such weapons. Yet it is always easy for the person with evil intent to secure a pistol or revolver, while often the innocent and defenseless person is without this means of protection. The writer believes that the possession of such a weapon, especially when equipped with the modern safety devices, is often most essential, particularly in small towns and isolated sections where help is not instantly available in case of sudden need. Many a man when obliged to be away from home feels an added sense of security if his wife has a hammerless revolver and has learned how to handle it properly.

Target-shooting with either pistol or revolver is rapidly becoming more popular. It is truly remarkable what accuracy can be attained with these weapons with a fair amount of practice. One of the most famous American pistol shots was Ira A. Paine. He became so expert with the pistol that he traveled all through Europe giving exhibitions. His shooting was so remarkable that in 1882, in the presence of a notable assemblage, he was knighted by the King of Portugal and made a chevalier of an ancient military order. His skill was such that he was commonly supposed to resort to tricks to accomplish his results and many attempts were made to expose him.

The ability to handle a pistol or revolver properly and the knowledge of what can be accomplished with such a weapon is of real value to the possessor. It not only trains him to co-ordinate brain, eye, and muscle, but instills self-confidence and self-reliance. The revolver is deservedly popular in America and has made a record for itself which is beyond dispute. Properly handled and understood, it should receive more general recognition as a means of protection and of fascinating outdoor sport and recreation.

PRICE TREND OF THE NEW YORK STOCK MARKET

THE New York "Times" gives a very interesting chart showing the high and low of thirty industrials and twenty railway stocks over a period from January, 1915, to May 20, 1919.

The average thirty industrial stocks have risen from January, 1915, at which time the low was 49½, to December, 1916, when the high was 104. The next low point was in November, 1917, when the average price reached was 70½, and since that time there has been a continued advancing trend, with minor reactions, to May 20, 1919, when the thirty industrials touched an average price of 103.

In the case of the railway stocks the situation is different. In January, 1915, the average price of twenty railways was 73½, and until December, 1916, showed an upward trend to an average price of 93½, and from that time until December 30, 1917, a downward trend to an average price of 65½. Since that date they have risen only to 77½, or 12½ points, while the thirty industrial stock average has risen 32½ points.

SPECULATION AND INVESTMENT IN OIL SECURITIES

There is a mistaken idea that oil and conservatism can never go hand in hand. If a man would as carefully scrutinize his oil investments as he would any other and not be misled by exaggerated statements of unscrupulous promoters, he might profit to a greater extent in finding the oil industry a field for investment as well as a wild and hazardous speculation. There is a difference between a well-secured obligation of a responsible concern showing large earnings, and a prospect of no value; and it may be worth while for investors to give this serious thought, but they should not rely upon the judgment of an unscrupulous promoter or his agents. Write to this department of The Outlook if you are in doubt.

RAILWAY APPROPRIATION

Director-General of Railroads Walker D. Hines has made an appeal to Congress for an appropriation of $1,200,000,000 to cover the deficit incurred during 1918 and to carry the needs of the current year. If this request is granted, it will bring the total appropriation for the Railroad Administration up to $1,700,000,000. Of this total sum about seventy per cent represents money which will be tied up in working capital and should be returned to the Government as soon as practicable. The remaining thirty per cent will represent actual operating deficit for the year 1918 and the first part of 1919, the causes for which are twofold: first, the high level of cost for labor and materials; and, secondly, the falling off of business, and consequently shipments, since the cessation of war activities. This condition looms up as most discouraging, showing as it does growing deficits, and one would naturally believe that it would result in depressing the "rails." But it hasn't; on the contrary, this new development has been accepted by the public as a bull factor, and several of the medium-priced railway stocks have attained higher levels.

CONGRESS AND THE RAILWAYS

The President has decreed that "the railroads will be handed over to their owners at the end of the calendar year." This emphasizes the necessity of prompt Congressional action. Of course the roads cannot be turned back in their present state, for that would spell disaster and bankruptcy. Under Government management operating costs have increased so enormously that the majority of the roads are hardly earning their running expenses.

As soon as possible the country must begin railway construction and improvement. The physical position of some of the roads is lamentable. Some of them are badly off for rails and equipment, and indications are that their owners will formulate a practical programme for development. If the roads were turned back, under present conditions, without provision for adequate income, they would in short order become bankrupt, unable to pay either dividends or interest charges.

Congress must act to avert such a critical situation.

ARE RAILWAY BONDS BARGAINS TO-DAY?

Many authorities consider railway bonds cheap at the present time. During April the average for twenty bonds of high-grade and second-grade character was about 7½ points below the low point reached in the 1907 panic. However, we must realize that many corporations have been waiting to finance until after the Liberty Loans were successfully consummated, and a considerable amount of available investment capital will be taken up by the sale to American investors of foreign securities. The stock market in its buoyant stage attracts a fair amount of capital, and it is estimated that over $1,000,000,000 is now borrowed by brokers for their clients' account, but it seems to be the consensus of opinion among bond men and bankers of note that the bond market has started on its upward swing—the more gradual it is, probably the more lasting.

Well-secured bonds with a fair yield of an established railway system can, we believe, be purchased now with equanimity, but whether or not they are bargains depends upon the action of Congress.

THE INFLUX OF MONEY TO WALL STREET

When the demand for loans upon banks in the interior of our country is small and the interest rates decline to the point where there is little profit, it is customary for these banks to ship their funds to New York City. As the money accumulates in the small banks it is sent to the financial centers, and thence remitted by the Reserve banks to New York City, where it is placed on deposit with interest in the New York banks. This money in time finds its way to the Wall Street loan market, where it enjoys temporary employment at a fairly high interest rate. Money rates in New York City are always fairly high, but inclined to fluctuate widely. Not long ago call money touched 7 per cent, only to fall down to 3½ per cent in a few days' time, due to the arrival of funds from the interior. Borrowing by the Wall Street brokers recently crossed the billion-dollar mark.

This great activity in the stock market and the fact that money has not been sent East since the war broke out have accentuated the present Eastward movement. In the fall local demands will be the occasion for withdrawal of these funds sent to New York City for temporary employment, for it is only in the in-between or off season that outside money has to seek the Wall Street loan market.

SOUTH AMERICAN FINANCING

A syndicate of Eastern bankers recently brought out a large issue of city of Rio de Janeiro 6 per cent serial bonds, with an attractive yield of 6½ per cent. This is the first important bit of foreign financing since the cessation of hostilities, and one of the few loans our country has granted South America. In former years the financing for our Southern neighbors was done almost entirely by the European countries. Our start in this direction is regarded with favor, for it is realized that the money we loan to South American countries stimulates our commerce with these countries. It is declared that other pieces of South American financing are being considered by American bankers.

BY ANNA WORTHINGTON COALE

"Camping for Girls" is the subject of a fresh bulletin issued from Teachers College, New York City, announcing a new course which offers a general survey of the entire camping field, for the purpose of preparing leaders who are contemplating entering this new educational work. This course has the lure of woods in springtime, since it not only projects the prospective leader of girl campers into nine weeks of life in the open, but also gives glimpses of the trail, through veteran campers like Dan Beard, and, so to speak, straps on the pack with a woodsman whose knowledge of packing for the trail has been of value to the Government in saving seventy per cent of the space and vast sums of money formerly used in sending equipment for the Army overseas. It introduces the birds through representatives of the Audubon Society and gives the students three days of real camping experience through the hospitality of the Woodcraft League under the guidance of Ernest Thompson Seton. The lectures in this course include such subjects as "All-Year Camping Programme," "Recreational Methods of Teaching," "Educational Values of Camp Life."

This course, conducted by Teachers College in co-operation with the National Association of Directors of Girls' Camps, the Camp-Fire Girls, the Girl Scouts, the Woodcraft League, and the Camp Directors' Association of America (Boys' Camps), marks a notable effort to bring this important work up to the highest standards as regards ideals and practical working. Following the example of the Intercollegiate Athletic Association, the Camp Directors of Girls' Camps have appointed a committee to outline a standard method for teaching swimming and life-saving. Upon its adoption by the Association it will be recommended to all the camps as a standard to which every counselor who intends to teach swimming and life-saving in girls' camps should conform.

This recognition of the educational value of the summer camp by Columbia University removes it from its former place as an organization for recreation only into the ranks of the educational movements of the day, and ought to be a great stimulus to those engaged in the important work of supplementing the training given in the schools. In a study made recently by the Public Health Association—a Nation-wide study of the health of the coming generation—it was found that fifty per cent of the twenty-five million boys and girls of school age in America have physical defects that impede their normal development. The camps have a great opportunity in helping to build up and secure the proper physical development of our boys and girls, so that, possessing greater vitality and endurance, they may be ready to contribute in larger measure than the present generation to the needs of their country.

Even better than money

"A. B. A." Cheques are better than actual money for the traveler for several reasons: They are more convenient to carry—less bulky. They are safer, because no one can use them until you have countersigned them. Your countersignature on an "A. B. A." Cheque in the presence of the person accepting the cheque, is the only identification required.

They do not have to be changed into another kind of money when you go from one country into another. They are like dollars in the United States and Canada; like pounds, shillings and pence in the United Kingdom and the British Colonies; like francs in France, lire in Italy, and so on. In other words they are accepted internationally for payment of goods and services—"The safest, handiest travel funds."

Get them at your bank, or write Bankers Trust Company, New York, for booklet and information as to where they may be had in your vicinity.

BY THE WAY

"The Most Carefully Guarded Boy in America Killed by an Automobile when he was Out Alone for the First Time in His Life." This pathetic headline, carried in substance by all the dailies recently, brings to mind the story of Sindbad's seventh voyage—was it not?—and the inevitableness of fate. The sailor had been marooned on an apparently deserted island; he discovered a subterranean passage that led to palatial apartments; here he found a prince living in solitary state; why? Because the seers had foretold his death during this year, and his royal parents had sought to evade destiny by sending him to this lonely spot. Sindbad and the prince fraternized and made a feast. When the sailor began to cut a melon, his knife slipped, severed an artery in the prince's hand—and the augurs' prophecy was unhappily vindicated!

France is to have instruction in the home canning industry. Four missionaries of the art recently sailed from New York for that comparatively canless land to give lessons in the home preservation of food. Factories in France, of course, make canned goods, but even they do it, it is said, on a limited scale, with tin cans made by hand, slowly and in small lots.

"Apropos of Walt Whitman's centenary," a subscriber writes, "I wonder that he never made a poem out of the freight cars. There is certainly a lot of uplift to the spirit of the tied-down city dweller in the names on these cars. The other day, in a sordid factory and tenement district of New York City, I saw a freight train passing, and these were the roads that some of the cars came from: 'Frisco'—visions of '49, of the Golden Gate, of the blue Pacific! 'Père Marquette'—visions of the brave days of the explorers of the Mississippi Valley, of the racing steamboats later, of the Great Lakes! 'Northern Ontario'—visions of the cool North, of the Hudson's Bay Company, of the early voyageurs! 'Texas, Oklahoma, and Gulf'—visions of—you can supply these for yourself. But if Whitman didn't rise to this inspiration, perhaps the idea may be useful to some of his far-off imitators in this day of free verse. I offer it to them gratis."

A little manual on carpentry for boys contains this pregnant sentence: "Remember, it is not practice but study that will make possible doing the work right." The idea seems to be that if a boy goes ahead with the crude idea of "making something" he will develop into a "rule of thumb" worker, while the careful study of plans and methods will make him an accomplished and accurate artisan.

This advertisement from a daily paper gives the reader an unlooked-for glimpse into the inner life of a family:

Wanted—Houseworker to run small household in country place; must know how to care for boy five and girl twelve and be tactful enough to get along with their grandmother. Address —, etc.

A subscriber writes: "I am devoted to the moving-picture play, but I deplore the inanity of most of the movie dramas and the foolishness of many of the 'leaders' or captions introducing the pictures. I make an exception to one of these captions, however—in a play in which Mary Pickford is a 'slavey' heroine. She has made friends with Bess, a little dog next door. One day she is invited to come in to the cellar where her dog friend lives, and finds that there is a litter of puppies to greet her. She bursts out naively: 'Why, doggie, I didn't know you was married!'

The above-quoted note comes to hand at the same time that this story is printed in an evangelical weekly: A missionary to the Indians told of his difficulty in teaching English to his pupils. One of the backward ones came to him one day and informed him that a sparrow had built a nest in the crossbeams of his lodge. "Is there anything in the nest yet?" asked the missionary. "Heap much," said the Indian, proud of his English; "the sparrow has pups."

A North Carolina man, writing about his boyhood in the Atlanta "Constitution" and answering the question "What is good for a boy to eat?" says: "At this time of the year, according to the theories extant in North Carolina in 1870, a boy should have daily plenty of green fruit, pine rosin, young cucumbers, raw new potatoes, green blackberries, doughnuts, branch water and two hours in the swimming hole."

An after-dinner story-teller who had lived in China made a hit with this remark: "Anybody who doubts the wisdom of the Chinese should read their proverbs. They have a book of ten thousand proverbs, and they're all as wise and true as the first one in the volume, which says: 'It is safer to pull a tiger's tail than to call a woman's attention to her first gray hair.'"

The rubber eraser for obliterating pencil marks has long been a part of the standard equipment of a desk; a writer in "Popular Mechanics" extends the idea to the cleaning of wall paper, picture frames, etc. He says: "A rubber sponge, which may be purchased at five and ten cent stores, will clean wall paper very nicely. The rubber sponge (used dry, of course) can also be used to clean varnished woodwork, chandeliers, and other gilt or lacquered articles."

This story is credited to John Burroughs: "The Germans are the trickiest people in the world. A German at a dinner party took in a lady whose name he didn't catch. During the fish course he saw a man who had showed him up the week before in a crooked business deal, and he muttered to the lady, ferociously: 'Do you see that man to the left of the epergne? Well, if there's one man on earth I hate, it's him.' 'Why,' said the lady, 'he's my husband.' 'Yes, of course,' said the German; 'that's why I hate him.'"

A part of Dunsany's play "The Gods of the Mountain" ought to be posted in the dressing-room of every theater, a dramatic critic believes, to show actors the difference between disguise and impersonation. This is the passage quoted:

The green cloth is brought to the seven beggars by a thief. The scene reads then like this:

Ulf—We will wear a piece of it over our rags.

Ogno—Yes, yes, we shall look fine.

Agmar—That is not the way that we shall disguise ourselves.

Ogno—Not cover our rags?

Agmar—No, no. The first who looked closely would say: "These are only beggars. They have disguised themselves."

Ulf—What shall we do?

Agmar—Each of the seven shall wear a piece of the green raiment, underneath his rags. And peradventure here and there a little shall show through; and men shall say: "These seven have disguised themselves as beggars. But we know not what they be."

Are You a Blonde?

The Secret of Making People Like You

THE greatest asset any man can possibly have is the faculty for making people like him. It is even more important than ability.

The secret of making people like you lies in your ability to understand the emotional and mental characteristics of the people you meet.

Did you know that a blonde has an entirely different temperament than a brunette?—that to get along with a blonde type you must act entirely different than you would to get along with a brunette?

When you really know the difference between blondes and brunettes, the difference in their characters, temperaments, abilities and peculiar traits you will save yourself many a mistake—and you will incidentally learn much you never knew before about yourself.

PAUL GRAHAM was a blonde, and not until he learned that there was all the difference in the world between the characteristics of a blonde and those of a brunette did he discover the secret of making people like him.

Paul had been keeping books for years for a large corporation which had branches all over the country. It was generally thought by his associates that he would never rise above that job. He had a tremendous ability with figures—could wind them around his little finger—but he did not have the ability to mix with big men; did not know how to make people like him.

Then one day the impossible happened. Paul Graham became popular.

Business men of importance who had formerly given him only a passing nod of acquaintance suddenly showed a desire for his friendship. People—even strangers—actually went out of their way to do things for him. Even he was astounded at his new power over men and women. Not only could he get them to do what he wanted them to do, but they actually anticipated his wishes and seemed eager to please him.

From the day the change took place he began to go up in business. Now he is the Head Auditor for his corporation at an immense increase in salary. And all this came to him simply because he learned the secret of making people like him.

You too, can have the power of making people like you. For by the same method used by Paul Graham, you can, at a glance, tell the characteristics of any man, woman or child—tell instantly their likes and dislikes, and YOU CAN MAKE PEOPLE LIKE YOU: Here is how it is done.

Everyone you know can be placed in one of two general types—blonde or brunette. There is as big a difference between the mental and emotional characteristics of a blonde and those of a brunette as there is between night and day. You persuade a blonde in one way—a brunette in another. Blondes enjoy one phase of life—brunettes another. Blondes make good in one kind of a job—brunettes in one entirely different.

To know these differences scientifically is the first step in judging men and women; in getting on well with them; in mastering their minds; in making them like you; in winning their respect, admiration, love and friendship.

And when you have learned these differences—when you can tell at a glance just what to do and say to make any man or woman like you, your success in life is assured.

For example, there's the case of a large manufacturing concern. Trouble sprang up at one of the factories. The men talked strike. Things looked ugly. Harry Winslow was sent to straighten it out. On the eve of a general walkout he pacified the men and headed off the strike. And not only this, but ever since then, that factory has led all the others for production. He was able to do this, because he knew how to make these men like him and do what he wanted them to do.

Another case, entirely different, is that of Henry Peters. Because of his ability to make people like him—his faculty for “getting under the skin” and making people think his way, he was given the position of Assistant to the President of a large firm. Two other men, both well-liked by their fellow employees, had each expected to get the job. So when the outside man, Peters, came in, he was looked upon by everyone as an interloper and was openly disliked by every other person in the office.

Peters was handicapped in every way. But in spite of that, in three weeks he had made fast friends of everyone in the house and had even won over the two men who had been most bitter against him. The whole secret is that he could tell in an instant how to appeal to any man and make himself well liked.

A woman who had this ability moved with her family to another town. As is often the case, it is a very difficult thing for any woman to break into the chill circle of society in this town, if she was not known. But her ability to make people like her soon won for her the close friendship of many of the “best families” in the town. Some people wonder how she did it. It was simply the secret at work—the secret of judging people's character and making them like you.

YOU realize, of course, that just knowing the difference between a blonde and a brunette could not accomplish all these wonderful things. There are other things to be taken into account. But here is the whole secret.

You know that everyone does not think alike. What one likes another dislikes. What pleases one offends another. And what offends one pleases another. Well, there is your cue. You can make an instant “hit” with anyone, if you say the things they want you to say, and act the way they want you to act. Do this and they will surely like you and believe in you and will go miles out of their way to PLEASE YOU.

You can do this easily by knowing certain simple signs. In addition to the difference in complexion, every man, woman and child has written on them signs as distinct as though they were in letters a foot high, which show you from one quick glance exactly what to say and to do to please them—to get them to believe what you want them to believe—to think as you think—to do exactly what you want them to do.

In knowing these simple signs is the whole secret of getting what you want out of life—of making friends, of business and social advantage. Every great leader uses this method. That is why he IS a leader. Use it yourself and you will quickly become a leader—nothing can stop you.

You have heard of Dr. Blackford, the Master Character Analyst. Many concerns will not employ a man without first getting Dr. Blackford to pass on him. Concerns such as Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company, Baker-Vawter Company; Scott Paper Company and many others pay Dr. Blackford large annual fees for advice on dealing with human nature.

So great was the demand for these services that Dr. Blackford could not even begin to fill all the engagements. So Dr. Blackford has explained the method in a simple, seven-lesson course, entitled, “Reading Character at Sight.” Even a half hour's reading of this wonderful course will give you an insight into human nature and a power over people which will surprise you.

Such confidence have the publishers in Dr. Blackford's course, “Reading Character at Sight,” that they will gladly send it to you on approval, all charges prepaid. Look it over thoroughly. See if it lives up to all the claims made for it. If you do not want to keep it, then return it and the transaction is closed. And if you decide to keep it—as you surely will—then merely remit five dollars in full payment.

Remember, you take no risk, you assume no obligation. The entire course goes to you on approval. You have everything to gain—nothing to lose. So mail the coupon NOW, and learn how to make people like you, while this remarkable offer is still open.

Training for Authorship

How to write, what to write,
and where to sell.

Cultivate your mind. Develop your literary gifts. Master the art of self-expression. Make your spare time profitable. Turn your ideas into dollars.

Courses in Short-Story Writing, Versification, Journalism, Play Writing, Photoplay Writing, etc., taught personally by Dr. J. Berg Esenwein, for many years editor of Lippincott's Magazine, and a staff of literary experts. Constructive criticism. Frank, honest, helpful advice. Real teaching.

Dr. Esenwein

One pupil has received over $5,000 for stories and articles written mostly in spare time—"play work," he calls it. Another pupil received over $1,000 before completing her first course. Another, a busy wife and mother, is averaging over $75 a week from photoplay writing alone.

There is no other institution or agency doing so much for writers, young or old. The universities recognize this, for over one hundred members of the English faculties of higher institutions are studying in our Literary Department. The editors recognize it, for they are constantly recommending our courses.

We publish The Writer's Library. We also publish The Writer's Monthly, especially valuable for its full reports of the literary market. Besides our teaching service, we offer a manuscript criticism service.

Setting a Candle to Catch a Thief

OUTSIDE air that filters through the brick-enclosing walls of boilers, costs industrial America many thousands of dollars each year because such leakage "cools" the fire, kills draft and therefore wastes coal to the extent of thousands of tons in the national aggregate.

Yet, just as the detection of such leaks is easy (see note under picture), so is the remedy simple; but it is simple largely through the pioneer work of Johns-Manville in its practical contributions to boiler-furnace improvement.

Through a complete line of products listed below, Johns-Manville can assure plants of new standards of heat saving in the boiler-room; standards that met and satisfied the Government during the coal crisis just past, when tons of fuel were saved and many hours of shut-downs averted—at a consequent increase in factory production.

Seldom has conservation been better served by Johns-Manville than in this branch of its service.

And it can be predicted that the products listed below, and the expert knowledge of their application, will be of as great service to the nation in this present period of post-war readjustment as they were during the war.

Because to the progressive plant, conservation has become permanently a national obligation, as well as a business expedient.

H. W. JOHNS-MANVILLE CO.
New York City
10 Factories—Branches in 63 Large Cities

These Johns-Manville Products save fuel in boiler-rooms:

High Temperature (Refractory) Cements for boiler settings.

Aerite Boiler Wall Coating for boiler wall exteriors.

Monolithic Baffle Walls—tight, durable, easy to install; prevent short circuiting of hot gases.

Asbestos Sheets and Blocks for insulating hot surfaces; Insulating Cements.

Heat Insulations for steam and hot water piping.

Steam Traps.

See Ring Packing—eliminates unnecessary friction between rod or plunger and packing.

A WOODEN frame, over which is fastened a square of cardboard having a small aperture at its center, is pressed against a boiler wall and the edges temporarily but completely sealed by some plastic material. It is obvious that any leakage in the part of the boiler wall covered by this frame, will immediately be detected by the inrush of air at the small aperture in the center of the cardboard, consequently, a candle flame held to this aperture will be sucked inward, thus immediately revealing the fact that there is an infiltration of air through the boiler wall, which means fuel waste.

Thousands of tons of coal have been saved by preventing boiler wall leakage and by similar corrective measures at and around the boiler furnace.

A complete service in this department of engineering was one of the important contributions made by Johns-Manville during the fuel crisis.

EASING GERMANY'S BURDEN

In the process of openly arriving at open covenants, according to the practice at the Peace Conference, very little official information is transmitted to the public; but a good deal comes through press despatches which, if not information exactly, is at least strong intimation. From these press despatches, sent by correspondents of varying sympathies and interests, it is evident that for a week or more there has been a strong tendency in the Big Four—consisting of President Wilson, Prime Minister Lloyd George, Monsieur Clemenceau, President of the Council, and Signor Orlando—to make the terms easier for Germany. Of these four Monsieur Clemenceau is the one who stands out against this tendency. France is still on the frontier of freedom.

Apparently there is the feeling that it is safe now to forget that Germany was not merely an enemy, but was also a criminal. There are intimations continued from the week before that the Kaiser and others in the Imperial Government of Germany will never be brought to trial.

There are very definite statements to the effect that the reparation demanded from Germany for the incalculable injury she has done is to be materially modified in Germany's favor. In particular, it is asserted that the amount of money required, instead of being left to be determined by the facts as they are slowly but accurately gathered in the future, is to be limited to a fixed sum which, it is safe to say, would never be increased hereafter, no matter how much may hereafter be discovered as due and collectable. There is every reason to believe the quite unanimous report that such modification is approved by the American delegates.

It is also reported, and not disputed, that the admission of Germany within a comparatively brief time, to be measured by months, not years, to the League of Nations on an equality with all other countries is seriously advocated and almost agreed to. The pretext, if not real reason, for this is the argument that the admission of Germany to the League of Nations will keep her from forming a rival league; but how can reasonable men expect any real solidarity in the League of Nations if it is composed of a criminal and a sheriff's posse?

AUSTRIA COMPLAINS

During last week the Austrians expressed their dissatisfaction with the peace terms offered them. It is hardly to be expected that Austria, once the chief partner in a dual control of 50,000,000 people, would be satisfied to become a small kingdom of 7,000,000. A glance at the map printed with this shows how Austria has been reduced from an empire to one of the smallest countries in Europe. According to the peace terms, she has not even a door upon the sea. She becomes, like Switzerland, an inland nation. The fact, however, that Austria calls the terms unjust does not make them unjust. Austria's present plight was foreseen long before the war ended. We may have sympathy with a good many of the Austrians who have no real and personal responsibility for the circumstances of which they have become victims, but there citizens in or out of Wall Street, the Senate has not done anything to bring great enlightenment to the country, but it has rendered a good service nevertheless.

To the ordinary citizen the details of the Peace Treaty will not be of great interest or concern. The fact that it is published in detail in an unofficial form is not likely to have much effect. Nor is the fact that the Treaty has come into private hands surprising. The difficulty of keeping any secret increases in geometrical ratio with the number of persons to whom the secret is confided. Such a document as this Treaty which is confided to a considerable number of officials is bound to fall into other hands. What is important, however, is that the Senate should

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY AS IT WAS; AUSTRIA AND HUNGARY AS THEY ARE

The shaded portions show the extent of the Dual Monarchy before the war; the black portions include the territory now left to the two countries ought to be no regret that the arrogant and tyrannical demand upon Serbia, by which Austria precipitated the world war, has had this outcome.

THE SENATE AND THE PEACE TREATY

In voting to print in the "Record" the full text of the Peace Treaty, even though it had not been officially communicated to the Senate by the President, and in voting to investigate statements that copies of the Treaty had found their way to private assert its right as a part of the government of a free people.

Since our Constitution expressly provides that treaties of peace shall be negotiated with the advice and consent of the Senate, it seems to us that the President should have found some way of keeping the Senate informed of the process of negotiations as they were conducted in Paris. The most natural method would have been the appointment of two Senators, one from the Democratic, one from the Republican party, to represent the country in Paris. If there were adereasons why he could not do this, he could at least have kept himself in communication with the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations while the negotiations were going on. Senators have good reason to feel that all opportunities for performing their Constitutional duties have been denied by the President. The climax of this policy is reached when the Treaty is given to the German nation and at the same time denied to the American Senate, without whose co-operation the Treaty, so far as the American people is concerned, is without any validity.

It is highly important, therefore, that the Senate should be conscious of its rights and its responsibilities in this matter. Amendment of the Treaty, and consequently inevitable delay, would inflict injury to the public interest; but it is not certain that greater injury may not be inflicted by defects which the Senate may discover in it. It is the business of the Senate to decide, in a judicial and non-partisan spirit which will be the less injurious—to leave defects uncorrected, or to delay the adoption of the Treaty by the process of amendment. By its action last week the Senate showed that it is not unaware of its power and its duty.

A GREAT MILITARY CITIZEN

One of the men to whom the United States owes a great debt which has never been paid is Major-General Enoch H. Crowder. His service was not merely a military service; it was a service to the moral and civic spirit of the Nation. It is fitting, therefore, that he should be the recipient of honorary degrees from American universities. On June 4 he was honored by Columbia University, and it is understood that he will likewise be honored by other colleges.

It is to him more than to any other man that America owes the possibility of performing one of the miracles of the war. In spite of warning, in spite of the efforts of thousands of citizens who had learned the lesson of history, in spite of the object-lessons which Germany was daily giving us for two years and a half, the United States was shockingly unprepared for war when war was declared. General Crowder, however, was not unprepared. For years he had studied the problem of what self-governing free people like the Americans should do to organize themselves for war. He had worked out the plan. In every detail he had provided for emergencies. He believed that it would be necessary to form a great army of citizens, and he likewise believed that the organization by which that army should be formed should be under citizen control. He counted on the power of the civic spirit of the community to carry through what could never be accomplished by bayonets or machine guns. His conception has been termed conscription. It is more accurate to call it a form of mass volunteering. He created the Draft Board. He conceived and put through the process of selective service. He was ready with a plan, and when the law was passed he was ready with all the blanks and the detailed plans of organization. It seems as if our Service Boards sprang up in a night. They did, because the seed was prepared and planted.

General Crowder is a military man who understands the civic spirit of a free people and who provided a free people with a powerful military instrument admirably suited to their spirit and their needs.

ON THE KNIFE-EDGE

"I believe a hurt has come to Europe that may be greater than any hurt that is measured by the destruction that war has wrought directly, . . . and that hurt is the disorganization of the whole industrial machine of the Continent of Europe, and in a lesser degree of England."

This is in substance what Mr. Frank Vanderlip, who has since resigned as President of the National City Bank of New York, said before the Merchants' Association of that city on June 4. It is likewise the substance of what he has said on two other occasions—a meeting of the Economic Club and a meeting of the Pan-American Conference.

The picture which he has drawn of Europe has shocked a good many Americans. It has been received with skepticism. It has been called pessimistic. Men who have seen Europe, however, within the past few months, who have seen something beneath the surface, have received a greater shock than any speech that Mr. Vanderlip or any one else could give. What is striking about Mr. Vanderlip's speeches is not their pessimism, but their optimism. He believes that Europe is balancing on the knife-edge, and he also believes that Europe can be saved.

What Mr. Vanderlip is looking at is not merely the devastation in Belgium and northern France, but the disorganization of the industrial machine, the idleness, the closed factories, the want and hunger. And even more than that, he notes the discontent that is not satisfied with mere increase of wages, but survives in that "grave suspicion in the minds of a great body of workers that there is some legerdemain, there is something by which you can apparently hand them higher wages, but so manipulate the value of what you pay the wages in that they are worth no more to the man who earns them; and with that suspicion in the minds of men there is always inflammable material."

Europe, he explains, can be saved only by providing her with the things that will enable her to work. She is a huge industrial center like a city. She must have credit and raw materials. And we here in America are the ones who can help. And by helping Europe we help ourselves, for any trouble that comes to Europe as a consequence of continued idleness is going to be deeper than any trouble that she has had and is going to spread to this hemisphere. Mr. Vanderlip expresses his optimism by saying: "If you could share my opinion of the opportunity that America is going to have in the world, the opportunity of service, of responsibility, and of recompense—if you could share my opinion, you would be the most optimistic crowd of men that ever was gotten together under a roof." And he adds:

Now, all that is based on the supposition that Europe is going to gather herself together and start back toward a normal life under the present capitalistic system of society. Remember, I am not sure that Europe is going to do that, but if Europe does, then our position is the most favored that any nation in any time in history ever had.

Mr. Vanderlip's conclusion is that the short cut to industrial peace lies in such an understanding of the labor question as will enlist the brains and good will of labor; that "the greatest question in the world to-day is this adjustment of differences between capital and labor;" and that that question will have to be approached on the part of employers with an understanding and liberalism that goes further than anything we have had hitherto. The future of the world, he said, rests with the country which is the first to solve the problem of labor and capital.

STRIKING AGAINST EVERYBODY

If the telegraph and telephone workers abandon their wires, not the employing corporations but the citizens of the country will be the most seriously injured party. There may have been a time when the telegraph and telephone were luxuries, but to-day they are a domestic as well as a business necessity; and, as has been pointed out, if this so-called sympathetic strike were really universal, a call to police or fire department from a home in trouble would be in vain. Fortunately, no such universal strike is likely. The Western Union Company is very positive that the strike ordered to begin just as this issue of The Outlook is going on the press will be a failure, and points to the relatively small number of its operators who are members of the unions concerned as evidence of this.

The public is not so much interested at this moment in the causes of this proposal to put the wires of the country out of business as it is in the fact that such a proposition should be made seriously. The trouble, as we understand it, originated in the dismissal of a few operators in Atlanta, as the unions allege because of their union connections, as the company alleges because of other reasons. A strike of the operators belonging to the telegraphers' union in Atlanta followed; thence the strike order was extended throughout the Southern States; and now it is proposed to call out operators throughout the country in sympathetic support. The operators insist that the real question at issue is the right of collective bargaining; the company makes the usual reply that it is ready to deal with committees of employees and that an association of operators exists which is working in harmony with the corporation. From Cleveland, on June 10, comes the statement that the telephone workers, both operators and construction men, and also the unions of electrical workers not connected with telegraph or telephone, are preparing to join the strike purely as a sympathetic demonstration. The recent action of Secretary Burleson in turning back to the companies the operation (not the control) of the wires has relieved the Government of responsibility for these strikes which many think it ought to have. But if a National strike is declared the Government through its Labor Board should certainly intervene.

One benefit to the country might result amid all the evil, inconvenience, and damage that would follow such a wide-scale strike—that is, it might serve to bring one patent truth into the practical field of legislation, the truth that strikes or lockouts by bodies of men employed in the public service should be made contrary to law, at least certainly illegal until arbitration and conciliation have done their best; a necessary corollary is that authorized and effective methods of such arbitration should be provided by law.

The spread of the sympathetic strike on a large scale and its occasional growth into what is called a "general strike," in which all union men, or even all workers without regard to trade or employment, are called upon to stop their work in order to bring pressure upon the settlement of some particular grievance or demand, are likely to divide organized labor into two camps. The American Federation of Labor, which is in National session as we write, is apparently opposed to this "general strike" idea. For instance, it is expected that the American Federation will pronounce positively against the proposal to inaugurate a Nation-wide strike in July in protest against the continued imprisonment of Thomas J. Mooney. A large number of individual unions have voted in favor of such a strike, and it is said that a majority of the delegates at the American Federation meeting believe that Mooney was unfairly tried and that there should be a remedy. If, therefore, the Federation discountenances such a general strike, it is on the ground that this is an improper and unfitting method of dealing with labor problems. Another similar sign among the more conservative representatives of organized labor is the recent action of the American Federation in taking away its charters from some unions in Canada which have been concerned in the recent dangerous general strikes.

The plan of getting all workmen to act as if they belonged to "one big union" and to strike without regard to the question whether men in their own trades are affected by a labor problem is unsound in reason, extremely dangerous to public welfare in execution, and is so unlimited in its appeal that it will probably prove a total failure and will fall to the ground from its own overweight. The attempts at this method of compulsion by universal threat and boycott that have been made in Seattle and in several Canadian cities have roused public sentiment against the idea and proved that it is intolerable.

A DIVISION AMONG RADICAL THINKERS

Not only in labor circles, but among Socialists of the type who believe in advancing the ideas of Socialism by political and not by revolutionary methods, there is coming to be a sharp division. Evidences of this have lately been brought out in the protest of such Socialists against the wild talk of Anarchists who, under the guise of Socialism, advocate "direct action," or, so far as they dare, uphold or suggest the methods of the murderous villains who institute attacks on organized society, such as the recent bomb explosions in American cities. Mr. Morris Hillquit, for instance, has earnestly protested in behalf of such Socialists against the use of that name in describing the advocates of Russian Bolshevism in this country. He declares that the Socialists must "clear the decks," and stigmatizes the present agitation of the "left wing" of so-called Socialists as "a purely emotional reflex of the situation in Russia, . . . a schismatic and disintegrating movement, . . . a sort of burlesque on the Russian Revolution."

It is not always easy to draw the line between reasonable radicals and agitators who are distinctly public enemies. Men like Debs and Berger have been so excessive in their violent utterances that they are certainly over the line. When, for instance, Berger, at a recent meeting in New York, said, as reported, "If the capitalists persist in their persecution of Socialism they will have anarchism, and they will deserve it," he certainly ranked himself with red revolutionists, and no Socialist of what has come to be comparatively a conservative type should show sympathy for such men or such utterances.

Various suggestions and proposals intended to deal with violence and threats of violence have been made since the recent bomb explosions. The opinion of thoughtful statesmen seems to incline to the belief that what is needed is not more law, but better enforcement of the laws we have.

THE WOMAN SUFFRAGE AMENDMENT

The proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution submitted by the necessary two-thirds vote of the United States Senate to the States for ratification is in its text the identical amendment framed by Susan B. Anthony in 1875. It reads as follows:

Article —, Section 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

Section 2. Congress shall have power, by appropriate legislation, to enforce the provisions of this article.

The vote in the Senate was 56 to 25 in favor of the resolution; there were thus two more affirmative votes than the requisite two-thirds of the Senators present and voting, while eleven Senators were paired or absent. The political complexion of the vote in the Senate, so far as one existed, is shown by the fact that the resolution was supported in the combined vote of the two houses of Congress by 237 Republicans and 121 Democrats, and opposed by 27 Republicans and 87 Democrats. President Wilson sent a cable message of congratulation to the leaders of the woman suffrage cause.

Ratification by thirty-six of the States—three-fourths of the forty-eight—will be necessary to bring about the adoption of what may be the Nineteenth Amendment. Illinois and Wisconsin have already ratified. Advocates of Nation-wide suffrage are already planning vigorous campaigns for the doubtful States, and even hope that they may succeed in having special sessions of legislatures called to hasten ratification in time to allow of women voting everywhere at the next Presidential election. They are optimistic as to the probabilities of victory, and base their belief partly on the fact that already twenty-seven States allow women to vote in Presidential elections, and partly on the impetus obtained by the movement as a recognition of women's patriotic aid in war work and through the approval of Congress. As one evidence of the rapidity of the growth of public sentiment they point to the reversal of New York State's refusal in 1915 by a majority of 185,000 to accept the measure, when two years later it was carried by a majority of 102,000 votes. At that time The Outlook editorially recognized the steady progress of public opinion in this and other countries and the probable success of the effort to give women the ballot. It pointed out also what may here be repeated as now equally applicable, but on a National scale: "Wherever woman suffrage is asked for and granted there is laid upon the women a duty of doing something more than drop a ballot in a box. It lays on them the duty of new lines of study, discussion, and thought. A million and three-quarters of uninformed and indifferent voters added to the polling lists of New York State would be a calamity. The addition of a million and three-quarters of thoughtful, intelligent, and conscientious voters would be of inestimable value."

THE MENACE OF MEXICO

The constant uneasiness as to the danger of incursions from Mexico into American territory and violence to or pillaging of American citizens may be exaggerated by memories of what happened in Texas at Columbus and elsewhere, but it is certainly felt by the people who live near our border. The latest evidence of this is the earnest declaration of Governor Hobby, of Texas, in a long telegram to the Secretary of War, that the Mexican situation is critical; that an emergency may arise at any moment; that there are not enough troops near our border, and that he would like to have two brigades of the Texan National Guard Cavalry called into the Federal service. Informal reports from the War Department indicate that it considers Governor Hobby unduly alarmed and that the 20,000 troops now near the border are enough to prevent disorder.

The repeated threats of Villa against the Carranza régime and his reported occupation of the city of Chihuahua simply mean that northern Mexico is extremely likely again to be the scene of fierce partisan and guerrilla fighting. Granting Carranza all the good intentions conceivable, few people believe that he can make Mexico free from brigandage on a big scale and revolution perhaps on a small scale from now on until the new election for the Presidency takes place next year. In a sense, fighting is local in Mexico, but it is local in a large area, and, unfortunately, one locality involved is near our border.

Recent remarks of Mr. Gillett, Speaker of the House of Representatives, gave offense to some representatives of Mexico, who pointed to the large production of raw material in Mexico and the resulting great expansion of its exports as an evidence of peaceful and prosperous conditions in that country. Undoubtedly production has enormously increased in certain industries, and exports from Mexico have gone up by leaps and bounds, but this does not alter the fact that in other industries life and property are in danger, or that foreign, and probably especially American, managers and experts are exposed to blackmail and violence. Mr. Gillett said in plain words: "To get protection from either a regular or a bandit government only by paying for it is not civilized. . . . For some years the property and often the lives of foreigners in Mexico have been unsafe." Mexico and the United States may put up with this state of things if they find that Carranza can gradually improve it and educate his people in the schools and in the art of self-government—and it is fair to say that many people believe that Carranza is honestly trying to do this. But if conditions grow worse instead of better the old question of the danger to this country of a next-door neighbor who is quarrelsome at home and abroad will certainly come up in renewed and emphasized form.

THE JEWS IN POLAND

The appearance of new charges of cruelty to Jews in Lithuania has led to further discussion of the treatment of Jews by Poles. Statements that have been made by the Polish Premier, Mr. Paderewski, by General Pilsudski, and by Mr. Hugh Gibson, the American Minister at Warsaw, increase the belief, expressed in a discussion of this subject two weeks ago, that the constant use of the word "pogrom" in this connection is misleading and incorrect. By this we mean that neither the Polish Government nor the Polish army has connived at attacks or outrages upon the Jews, nor have they countenanced religious or racial warfare.

General Pilsudski, who is the President of the Polish Republic, for instance, totally denied that anything of the kind had taken place, while admitting that at Pinsk and at Vilna there had been attacks upon Jews, or fights between Jews and soldiers, which sprang from economic causes and from belief that the Jews attacked were Bolshevik in sympathy or spies of the enemy the Poles were fighting. Mr. Paderewski says much the same thing, with earnest assurances that his Government is using every effort to preserve order in a newly created country that is being viciously attacked by enemies on more sides than one, and has to deal with hostile sentiments within as well as without its borders. He adds specifically that Poland will not tolerate the persecution of Jews.

It is clear that searching inquiry should be made into the facts. Both Jews and Poles have asked the Paris Conference to take up the question. It should certainly lend its influence to condemn anything like racial or religious hatred or persecution, just so far as that despicable condition may exist.

MODERN HEALTH CRUSADERS

A very complete description was given in these columns under date of February 27, 1918, of the formation of the Modern Health Crusaders and the work the organization had accomplished up to that time. The National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis stands sponsor for this movement, which has for its object the introduction of a system of health education into thousands of elementary schools.

The whole Crusade is based on a system of so-called "Health Chores." There are eleven of these, planned to promote cleanliness and health. They are simple tasks, such as washing the hands before meals, keeping neck, ears, and finger-nails clean, breathing deeply, getting plenty of sleep and fresh air, brushing the teeth, and forming regular habits. The chores are made specific. The first one, for instance, reads, "I washed my hands before each meal to-day." Charts have been made allowing a space to check each chore every day of the week. These are distributed through the schools to the parents of the children. There is also a school-room chart which shows the rank of every member of the class. It is here that the first competitive feature comes in. A Nation-wide tournament of classroom groups was inaugurated on February 9, to last for fifteen weeks. The trophies for the victors will be pennants and banners, presented jointly by the National Tuberculosis Association and the American Red Cross.

The growth of the society has been remarkable. During the early part of last year its membership numbered about 500,000. There are now, however, in the neighborhood of 8,000,000 American school-children from six to sixteen years of age who have qualified as Crusaders through the official Health Chores. This number does not include enlistments in foreign countries to which the Crusade has spread, such as China, Korea, Canada, Cuba, and France.

WHAT THE CRUSADERS FIND

There are Crusaders in every State in the Union, Texas having the largest representation of three hundred and ten thousand, Minnesota's recruits numbering two hundred and fifty thousand. The Crusade has the public indorsement of the Governors of some of the States, and the reports from the superintendents and teachers of the various schools in all sections of the country are interesting and sometimes amusing. In Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, Iowa, and Oklahoma, for instance, there was a great run on tooth-brushes. In one town it is reported that "there was not a tooth-brush to be bought in any of the drug stores. Such news should indicate that our citizens are strong believers in keeping their teeth clean. But such is not altogether the case. The schools are putting on the Modern Health Crusade, and the pupils have taken to it like ducks to water." A Wisconsin superintendent writes: "I wish I had been informed of this campaign long ago, so that I might have stocked up with tooth-brushes, soap, and nail-files. . . . I would be a wealthy man had I been given a tip in time." The use of a common tooth-brush for the family is a more prevalent custom than one would imagine.

In New Mexico a Pueblo Indian boy removed a window from his home in order that he might get the mark for Chore 8. He also bathed in the almost icy river so that he might get the two baths prescribed. Two little boys had never slept with open windows. They were told to take the folders home to their mother and ask her to let them keep the windows open that night. The following morning the teacher met one of the boys, who, without any word of greeting, said: "She said we could, and we did!" So for the first time in their lives these boys slept in the fresh air.

One mother's indorsement is to the effect that her boy "used to fight if he had to wash. Now he would fight if he were not allowed to." And the teachers find that through the carrying out of these Health Chores the work in the classroom is much easier. It is not so often found necessary to send the pupils out to wash. The children look neater, and there is a noticeable improvement in the attendance.

The whole Nation is alive to-day to the need for a health campaign. It was found that three out of every ten men examined for the draft were disqualified because of physical disability, and in the vast majority of cases these physical defects could have been prevented if habits of health had been formed in childhood.

Like the Americanization work which is being done among the foreign-born in the schools, this Health Crusade among the children is carried into the homes throughout the land. Full information concerning the plan of organization and the work of the Modern Health Crusaders can be obtained from the Anti-Tuberculosis Associations of the various States or from the National Tuberculosis Association, 381 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

PARTY LEADERSHIP

IN this issue we print the second of Senator Davenport's articles on the political and legislative situation in New York State. Mr. Davenport writes as a Republican but not as a partisan.

The problems and necessities that confront his party in the Empire State are those which that party has to face in the Nation as the Presidential campaign of 1920 approaches. The issue of that campaign, as we see it, will be conservative-liberalism versus impetuous radicalism. But no leaders will succeed in conserving what is good in American institutions unless they are genuinely actuated by a spirit of liberal humanism.

If the Republican party expects to receive a popular mandate to administer the affairs of this country, it must see that its great captains and lesser captains are men of high standards and human sympathies.

The National Chairman, Mr. Hays, is such a man. Where are the State chairmen of a similar type? What is the State committee of New York doing to enlist the civic enthusiasm of the younger voters? Are other States any more alive to the necessities of the situation? We are not making criticisms, we are asking questions.

Theodore Roosevelt in 1910, in addressing the Sorbonne at Paris, said something that deserves re-reading at this juncture in Republican circles. These are his words:

"The average citizen must be a good citizen if our republics are to succeed. The stream will not permanently rise higher than the main source; and the main source of national power and national greatness is found in the average citizenship of the nation. Therefore it behooves us to do our best to see that the standard of the average citizen is kept high; and the standard cannot be kept high unless the standard of the leaders is very much higher."

MAKING THE LEAGUE A PERSONAL ISSUE

BAD temper never wins a convert. Personalities in debate never persuade. Searching for hidden motives invariably fails to reveal convincing arguments. This is something that every man's experience teaches. It would seem, therefore, that men engaged in the discussion of great questions might avoid in the course of their debate what they must know never serves any man's case. Yet a great deal of the debate over the League of Nations has little to do with the merits of the question.

Of what use is it to accuse the men who oppose or support the project for a League of Nations of being actuated by partisan politics? Those who are opposed to the League are not going to be persuaded to support it by being told that they are prejudiced partisans. And those who are supporting the League will be no readier to listen to arguments against it because they hear themselves denounced for their partisanship. Here, for example, is a sentence from one newspaper article in support of the League: "Looking at all this, I would deliberately say that I would rather take my stand with Judas Iscariot, with Abdul the Damned, with the memories of that vile court that sentenced Joan of Arc to flames, with John Wilkes Booth or Charles J. Guiteau, than line up with a purpose so diabolical, so far-reaching in its mischievous effects, as that of defeating the League of Nations." The opponents of the League can rival its supporters, however, in this sort of debate. Here is an illustration from a speech in the United States Senate: "There is an ex-President of the United States who is quite active in promoting the League, both the original and the amended League. He says that pygmies and old ladies are the only ones who are opposing either form of the League. If he were to put on a kimono and shave off his mustache, Mr. President, he would be the prize dawgager of the whole beautiful sisterhood."

As the debate continues in the public press and in the Senate Chamber one is impelled toward indiscriminating support of the League by its opponents, only to find one's self repelled from the League by its supporters. On the one hand, the American citizen seeking enlightenment is informed that the Covenant of the League of Nations is the price at which European nations have purchased President Wilson's support of their ambitious schemes. On the other hand, the American citizen is informed that opposition to the League is a "song of hate against President Wilson."

It has become difficult to discuss the Covenant of the League of Nations, as embodied in the Treaty of Peace, without incurring charges of partisanship from one side or the other. The whole question has become involved with the personality of the President and party strategy for the coming campaign.

This is the inevitable consequence of the way in which the Treaty has been drawn and the League of Nations promulgated. When the American Commissioners to Negotiate Peace were selected, they were chosen without consultation with the Senate. They were thus made the personal representatives of President Wilson. There is no Constitutional requirement that prevents the President from negotiating a treaty without consulting the Senate. The right of the Senate to deal with a treaty arises after the treaty has been negotiated. But this is more than a treaty in effect, if not in form. The Covenant of the League of Nations is, to use the President's own metaphor, tied to the terms of peace with so many threads that the Treaty cannot be dissected from the Covenant without destroying the whole vital structure. This Treaty with Germany has therefore been erected as a new instrument of government which is to function on some occasions on behalf, if not instead, of the sovereign Government of the United States. Thus it has happened that for America's part in the creation of a new world organization President Wilson has made himself responsible. He has denied to the legislative branch of the United States Government knowledge of the process of negotiating this Treaty. He has withheld the text of the Treaty even after it had been presented to the Germans. And he has deprecated discussion of it. He has chosen to act as America's sole representative in the drafting of the new international organization and to identify himself with its fortunes.

In pursuing this course he has, perhaps, acted within his technical Constitutional rights. Nevertheless the consequence is that those who support the Treaty find it difficult to do so without seeming to be partisan supporters of the President, while those who even criticise any of its features rest under the imputation of being actuated by partisan animosity.

Cannot we Americans rid ourselves of this mental bondage to the partisan spirit? Can we not discuss this momentous project on its merits? There is no hope for the success of the League of Nations if it is adopted on partisan or personal grounds. It can succeed only if it has behind it the power of an enlightened public opinion. If it has serious defects, they should be discovered and corrected before it is adopted. If it is on the whole a useful instrument for securing international justice, it is nevertheless only an instrument. The energy which will use it will be the human will; and if that is lacking, the instrument will be as useless as an engine without fuel. More important than any provision of the Covenant of the League of Nations is the measure of popular support behind it. Such support will come only when full and searching criticism is welcomed, heard, and answered.

The greatest disservice which supporters of the League can do to their own cause is to try to prevent criticism by denouncing the critics or to win support for the League by making it a partisan or personal issue. When a critic uses appeal to prejudice as a weapon against the League, he is strengthened, not weakened, by a counter-appeal to prejudice; he can be effectively answered only when it is shown that he is not attacking the League itself, but only its counterfeit.

No greater duty rests upon the American people to-day than to hear a full and free discussion of the Peace Treaty's merits and defects.

WHAT THE YUGOSLAVS WANT

IT is hard for Americans, accustomed to a country in which many people of diverse origin live together under common laws and a common liberty, to realize the bitterness of national feeling in parts of Europe. What Mr. Pasitch says in his interview with Mr. Mason, of The Outlook's staff, on another page is valuable, not because it states facts which need to be known, but because it serves to reveal the temper of mind with which those who are engaged in restoring peace must deal. No one can read that interview without realizing that the new Jugoslavic state is suspicious of practically all its neighbors.

There is historic reason for the hostility with which the Serbs look upon the Bulgars, and that reason has been reinforced by the experience of the last three years. As it is impossible for a Belgian to think of the Germans without recalling Louvain and Ypres and scores of desolated villages and hundreds of violated homes, so it is impossible for a Serb to think of the Bulgarians without recalling to mind similar heartless crimes.

Between the Croats and the Italians there is also historic reason for the existence of a spirit of suspicion, if not hostility. It is not necessary here to try to review the complicated events which have engendered this suspicion. It is enough, perhaps, to recall here the fact that it has been a policy of Hungary, which possessed Croatia, to develop this spirit of hostility between the Italians and the Croats within that province, and the fact that in the world war Croatian troops were among those of the Austro-Hungarian Empire which destroyed and devastated parts of northern Italy.

If it is natural for Americans to sympathize with the Serbian feeling toward the Bulgars, it would seem natural for similar reasons to sympathize with the Italian feeling toward the Croats. Serbians and Italians were alike partners with America in the fight against the band of robber nations of which Austria-Hungary and Bulgaria were members. But now the Serbians are going with the Croats. It is true that the Croats were a subject people in an enemy state; but they were not like the Czechs, likewise a subject people, but liberty-loving and willing to dare all and risk all for liberty. The Czechoslovaks while they were yet nominally a part of Austria-Hungary were open and vigorous allies of the free nations. That is not true of the Croats.

It is natural that the men who are forming, or trying to form, the new, scarcely nascent, state of Jugoslavia should speak of the Jugoslavs as if they were really all one people. They are not, and it is dangerous to ignore the fact that they are not. They may win unity, but they do not have it now. They must be helped to unity, doubtless, but they cannot be helped by a process of disregarding the fact that some of them were on the side of liberty and some, through ignorance or necessity perhaps, were on the side of the oppressors and the robbers.

There is an old and sometimes serviceable device which national leaders have used to create national unity. This is the practice of creating a common hostility. This is the method Bismarck used for uniting the German states. It was by providing for them common enemies to fight that he drew them together. In some cases political leaders have had no occasion to create a common hostility, for the enemy has done that himself. This was the case when the German King of Britain drove the British colonies of America together by a common oppression of them all. This was the case when Italian unity was fostered by Austria's tyranny. So, perhaps, the Jugoslav leaders may be thinking that they may promote unity between Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes if they can put Bulgaria and Rumania and Italy all in the same category as hostile to the Jugoslavic state. If that is their plan, it is one to which America must not lend her aid.

Last January we pointed out the fact that the Declaration of Corfu, made in 1917, demanding the establishment of a Pan-Serbian kingdom under the Serbian dynasty, was imperialistic in spirit and effect. Mr. Pasitch, who was one of the signers and prime movers of that Declaration, now declares in his interview that the peoples who have been under the yoke of foreign domination "have conceived such a hatred for the policy of enslavement and despoilment of other people's land that they would never think of themselves adopting such an imperialistic policy." If this is so, and we hope that it is, the experience of the war has enforced a needed lesson. But all the lessons have not yet been learned; and one of those lessons is that peoples like those of Jugoslavia who desire to form a new national life must give evidence of their competence and responsibility before they have a right to claim the authority and power that no one grudges to nations that have proved for years that they are competent and responsible. And one way by which the Jugoslavs can commend themselves to America is by speaking of America's allies in some other tone than that of suspicion and hostility.

POPULAR FALLACIES

II — THAT "WORKINGMEN OUGHT NOT TO SHARE THE PROFITS, BECAUSE THEY DO NOT SHARE THE LOSSES"

WHAT are profits? What are losses?

For all successful businesses in a civilized community two elements are essential: the man and the tool. To farm there must be a plowman and a plow; to make shoes there must be a cobbler and a cobbler's bench; to weave there must be Silas Marner and a loom. If the loom wears out, Silas Marner must remain idle; if Silas Marner wears out, the loom must remain idle. Therefore to continue his business he must receive from his industry enough to keep both him and his loom in good condition. If he is underfed and becomes sick, he cannot continue his business; nor can he continue if his loom wears out and he has not the money to repair it, or if the material is exhausted and he has no money to buy more. If he receives from his business just enough money to keep himself and family in good condition, and also to supply his loom with adequate material and keep the loom itself in good repair, his business is self-supporting. If he receives a little more than is necessary for this purpose and can put ten dollars in the savings bank at the end of the week, he is making a profit. If he receives less and has to draw money out of the savings bank in order to buy food for himself or material for his loom, he is carrying on his business at a loss, and when the savings bank money is gone the business must stop.

In the place of Silas Marner and his loom imagine in a village a factory employing five hundred workers. The problem is bigger and more complex, but is essentially the same: instead of the tool and the man there are tools and men. It is essential to the business that both the tools and the men be kept in good working condition. If the mill receipts are just sufficient to keep the mill and its machinery effective and the workers so well paid that they are satisfied and efficient, the work goes on and is self-supporting, but is not making profits. If the receipts are sufficient to keep both tools and men in good working condition, and also to pay dividends, there is profit for the stockholders. If the receipts are not sufficient and it is necessary to borrow money from the bank or levy assessments on the stockholders to be paid out of the future profits, there is a loss; and if this loss continues indefinitely, eventually the mill must stop its work.

What happens if Silas Marner finds that he is not earning as much money as he is spending? He proposes to his wife to reduce their living expenses. "We must economize somehow," he says. "Can't we cut down on the grocer's bill or the butcher's bill? If not, we shall have to take John out of school and set him to work." By one or the other of these plans he proposes to reduce the living wage he is paying to himself, because if he reduces his purchases for the material for his loom or his expenditures for necessary repairs he impairs the sources of his income. If he says to his wife, "I was going to paint the shop this fall, but I am afraid I shall have to let that go over," his wife, if she is a prudent economist, will reply: "Look out, Silas; if you leave it too long, you will have to put on two coats instead of one, and you will lose more than you will save."

The managers of the mill pursue the same policy if the receipts are not enough to keep the mill in good condition and also to pay the wages it has been paying. If it is paying no dividends, it is not run at a loss, it is simply running without a profit. But if it is running at a loss the managers say to themselves what Silas Marner says to his wife, "We must cut down living expenses." That means, "We must reduce wages."

The great proportion of strikes occur either because the business is prosperous and the workingmen think that they are not receiving a fair share of the profits and that the only way to get such a share is by demanding increased wages; or because the business is unprosperous and the managers can see no way to reduce the expenses except by reducing the wages. One of the worst strikes we have ever had in this country was the famous railway strike in 1894. The immediate cause of that strike was the action of the Pullman Company, which reduced the wages of its workingmen and neither reduced the dividends which it paid to its stockholders nor the salaries of its highly paid officials nor the rents which it collected from the cottages which it leased to its employees. In that case they levied all the loss on the workingmen.

In order to carry on any business the receipts from the business need not be enough to pay any profit to either the tool owners or the tool workers. But they must be enough to provide the life of both the tools and the men. If they are more than enough, the surplus is a profit; if they are less, the deficit is a loss. And a loss, if it continues, always means sooner or later—and generally sooner—a reduction in wages. The profit ought also to mean an increase in some form in the income of the tool workers as well as in the income of the tool owners.

That alone will not satisfy the reasonable aspirations of the tool workers. In most organized industries they want, and ought to have, some voice in the conduct of the business. But that is another question not here considered.

LYMAN ABBOTT.

A GENTLE CYNIC<sup>1</sup>

PROFESSOR Morris Jastrow has introduced to the public a new author and added to the Bible a new book.

The book of Ecclesiastes has long been a puzzle to commentators. It is a book of contradictions. Is it a poem or a philosophy? Is its voice that of cynicism or that of faith? Is its message the emptiness of life or the glory of life? It begins with "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity." It ends with "Fear God and keep his commandments." Which conclusion does the author mean us to accept?

The notion that the book was written by Solomon has been abandoned by most modern scholars. Probably the opinion which of late years has been generally entertained is that of Dean Stanley, who compares it to Tennyson's poem of "The Two Voices." This theory of its interpretation was thus defined by Lyman Abbott in his Sunday evening lectures on the Bible given in Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, in 1896:

The book of Ecclesiastes, portraying the complicated experiences of life, is a dramatic monologue—conflicting voices speaking in it, but the conflicting voices that speak in a single man. The man is arguing to himself; he is weighing and measuring the phenomena of life over against one another. A philosopher would take these things in order. He would first consider the efficacy of wisdom; then pleasure; then ambition; and when he had finished, then he would draw his lesson therefrom as to the teaching of life. But the writer of Ecclesiastes is not a philosopher; he is a poet; and it is not by this method of ordered thinking we do our meditating. On the contrary, thoughts come tumultuously into our mind; they fight their battle out within our consciousness; they contend for the mastery—ambition, sensuality, wisdom, conscience. There are no parliamentary laws in the human soul and no one to keep order—first one voice speaks, and then another, shouting against one another and drowning one another. Thus the book of Ecclesiastes is purposely confused, deliberately and of intention confused, because it is the portrayal of the confused experiences of a soul divided against itself.

Professor Jastrow propounds a different theory; so far as we know, he is the first one to propound it. His theory is that a "gentle cynic" wrote the original book; that as it issued from his pen it was by a Hebrew "Omar Khayyám;" that some orthodox critic—there may have been more than one—added to it comments, emendations, corrections, replies, and gave it to the world in its amended form; and that the proverbs which are scattered through the poem or essay were added by him or by other commentators from time to time to illustrate and enrich the thought of the book.

A remote analogy might perhaps be found in Coleridge's "Aids to Reflection," the reflections being suggested to him largely by select passages from Archbishop Leighton. Archbishop Leighton is now generally forgotten and "Aids to Reflection" finds its place in our libraries for the sake of Coleridge's comments. Somewhat similarly it is supposed that the original Ecclesiastes has been forgotten and it is to the comments of the orthodox editor that the book owes its place in our Bible. Professor Jastrow, with much painstaking and much literary skill, has eliminated from the Book of Ecclesiastes what he regards as the comments of the unknown editor or editors, and the result, given in his own translation, is a charming poem, a real addition to the world's satirical literature.

Supposing Professor Jastrow's theory to be correct, the anonymous author of the original Ecclesiastes is a genial as well as a gentle cynic; there is no self-conceit and no bitterness in his cynicism, and in his pessimism no despair. He stands apart from the world and laughs at it, but laughs quite good-naturedly, and the reader laughs with him. Like Bernard Shaw, he takes nothing seriously, not even himself.

Again and again he declares that life is but a "chasing after wind." This is a favorite figure with him; nine times he repeats it in his short poem. Professor Jastrow thus interprets it in a note: "Ambition is like chasing the wind, you can never catch it, and if you did it would be of no use." We are but children running after soap-bubbles; foolish boors trying to find the end of the rainbow for the pot of gold we have been told is buried there.

A single brief quotation will best give to our readers an idea of the spirit of the poem which Professor Jastrow has discovered in the Book of Ecclesiastes—or created out of it:

He who loves silver will never have enough silver, and he who loves a big pile, will have no profit (of it)— surely this is vanity.

With the increase of goods, its participants increase;
and what advantage is it to its owner except to look at it?

Sweet is the sleep of the laborer, whether he has eaten little or much, but the satiety of the rich does not permit him to sleep.

A sore evil that I have seen under the sun, is riches hoarded by the owner, and when that fortune is lost through a bad venture, the son begotten by him has nothing.

He cannot carry anything that he has acquired by his toil away with him.

Surely this is a sore evil, that just as he came, so he goes. Therefore what profit is it to him that he toils for the wind and that he spends all his days in saving and in constant worry and sickness and distress?

Therefore, it seems to me the thing that is good and proper is to eat, drink, and to have a good time with all one's toil under the sun during the span of life which God has allotted to one, for that is his portion. Every man to whom God has given riches and possessions and who has (also) the power to enjoy it and to take his portion and to be happy in his toil—this is a gift of God. For he should remember that life is short and that God approves of joy.

Professor Jastrow's Ecclesiastes is not inspiring, but neither is it depressing. It is not profound, but it is keen and caustic. And it leaves the reader a little in doubt whether the original author is satirizing life or satirizing the pleasure-seeker's view of life which he assumes for the purpose of poking fun at it.

We must leave the expert Hebrew scholar to deal with Professor Jastrow's theory. But we wish that he might be persuaded to print in a little booklet the Book of Ecclesiastes as he interprets it, and so put before the ordinary lay reader this delightful satire, which in the present form will be accessible only to Biblical scholars.

BACH AT BETHLEHEM, 1919

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE FROM FULLERTON L. WALDO

WHEN the Bach Choir sings under Dr. Wolle's flexuous fingers at Bethlehem, it is more than the making of music—it is the creation of an atmosphere.

Thoreau says it takes two to speak truth—one to speak and one to hear; and after laboring a whole year behind closed doors it is a final inspiration for the two hundred and forty-seven singers to be openly heard by an audience which devoutly follows—in many cases word by word and note by note—the corps of singers hurling their very souls after their voices into ethereal space beyond all architectural confines. The listeners are as necessary as the performers, and they listen for the music's sake and not for the lure of the renown of any individual musician. Dr. Wolle himself lays all the laurels he has gathered in the course of fourteen festivals at the feet of the Cantor of Eisenach—"ad majorem gloriam Dei." How strange it seems that in Bach's own day he was badgered and hectorated by a myopic school committee who hadn't the least idea of the ultimate leading of the celestial sounds which to them were only the ugly and hateful contraptions of the devil's maleficence!

Some people to-day are residuary legatees of the ears of that school committee, and they say that Bach is too much for them—or even that they cannot abide him. Each year Dr. Wolle makes converts of many who first endure and then embrace the alleged inhuman austerities of the music; which accounts for the fact that the convocation in Packer Church of Lehigh University this year hailed from eighteen States and overflowed the big church to the living green of the bird-haunted, forest-clad, sun-dappled academic acreage.

There were given on the first day (June 6) eight cantatas which do not require naming; the Mass in B Minor, according to custom, glorified the second and final day. The chorales interspersed among the cantatas made it clear how many fine professional voices there were in the audience—or congregation, as one pleases. It is a great relief—a safety-valve to pent-up emotions—to rise and sing one's head off and one's heart out with the rest. The whole assemblage takes the contagion from the wonderful ascendancy of Dr. Wolle over the Choir, and here the shining ideal of community singing is realized. The leader gives himself utterly to the singers and the singing, and so unsparing is he of his nervous vitality that he must perceive that virtue has gone out of him with every measure he surcharges with his electrodynamic personality.

With the very first notes of his peculiarly long-visioned version of "The Star-Spangled Banner" Dr. Wolle tied himself in bowknots, and from that moment he was "all over the shop" till the last protracted "Amen" of "Dona Nobis Pacem" was sounded. Said one of the veteran basses: "With that crook of his little finger Dr. Wolle becomes a fisher of men and women; he seems to haul us by a kind of hypnosis after him."

With the full orchestral apparatus plus the organ in the background, one becomes conscious principally of a single overwhelming polyphonic cataract, to which the several currents of the eight divisions of the voices contribute in due measure.

The greatest "solo opportunity," to use the unblest phrase, is in the ineffably exquisite and touching "Agnus Dei," and Merle Alcock this year sang it—as hearer remarked—with the enamored care and the perceptive feeling one finds in the work of the best of the Florentine painters. The sole inartistic thing Dr. Wolle allowed himself to do came with the "Amen" after the "Dona Nobis Pacem." To show that his singers after all the racking exactions of two days were not exhausted he let them display their extraordinary breath-control by making this final "Amen" a dozen times as long as Bach wrote it to be, tapering the sound down to the tiniest pianissimo, and then letting it outwell again just as one supposed it was to die away altogether. It was amazing, it was enlivening, but it was unlawful. It was what the schoolboy calls a "stunt" pure and simple.

To other choruses the lesson of the Bach Choir is that an agglomeration of good singers does not make an effectual singing unit without downright year-round labor that spurns the thought of union hours and does all for love. Dr. Wolle does not have extraordinary material at his command. Many of his singers have been at work with the Bethlehem Steel Company making the guns and the shells which the still, small voice of their own music at last cries down and brings to discomfiture. There is a text for the moralist in this salient anomaly.

If these singers were heralded artists, competing for repute, they would be noted and praised, no doubt, but they would not have reached the high pinnacle of prestige whereon to-day their Choir stands. The cathedrals of old were reared by humble folk who built their own aspirations, their own hungering dreams of the Infinite, into the work of their finite hands; and that work lives after them.

BOLSHEVISM TESTING CANADIAN COMMON SENSE

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE FROM CANADA

SINCE the middle of May Canada has had a long series of labor troubles which have resulted in considerable disturbance of business conditions and inconvenience to a large proportion of her citizens. For a time there was a threat of serious trouble of a nature not usually associated with strikes, but happily the worst fears were not realized.

In Canada, as elsewhere, labor is of opinion that increases in wages have not kept pace with the rapidly increasing costs of living. There has been much unrest in Canada, as elsewhere. The general discontent made easy the task of a few dangerous and ambitious agitators whose scarcely concealed ambition was to raise the red flag of revolution. The recent labor disturbances which have troubled the life of the Dominion were not ordinary strikes. They were poorly planned and clumsily executed attempts to set up Bolshevik governments in several communities. Apparently a soviet government was actually, if not nominally, in control of Winnipeg, the principal city of the western provinces, for a period of about two weeks. True, the red flag did not float over the City Hall, as was reported at the time in outside papers; but for two weeks such places of business as remained open and the few public utilities that were permitted to serve the public were for the most part allowed to operate only by the express leave of the strike leaders. Even the mail service was paralyzed. Telegraph communication with the outside world was shut off. The newspapers were not permitted to be published. The police were under the control of the strike committee. The firemen were on strike, and the only fire protection to be had was afforded by an energetic band of citizen volunteers working under the handicap of the dangerously low water pressure permitted by the strike leaders.

Early in the year, at a big labor convention in Calgary, definite plans for the organization of Canadian labor in "One Big Union" were presented by the extremists among Canadian labor leaders and adopted in spite of considerable opposition. In the weeks that followed the idea was adopted by many of the labor unions, although it meant severing connections with the international organizations of which Canadian trade unions have long been members. The saner elements in Canadian labor, conspicuous among which were the railway brotherhoods and the typographical unions, held aloof; but the movement spread rapidly nevertheless.

Trouble started in Winnipeg, where the "One Big Union" leaders, through a committee, made demands on behalf of the metal workers. The employers were prepared to recognize the regularly constituted unions, but they refused to negotiate with this new committee; whereupon a general strike was ordered by the "One Big Union" leaders, and the life of the city was paralyzed for a time. When it became apparent that the battle was going against them, the leaders sent out a call—by messenger, for there were no mails, telegraphs, or telephones—for sympathetic general strikes in other cities. The avowed object was to tie up every Canadian city from Halifax to Vancouver. The response was disappointing to the strike leaders. General strikes were called in several cities in which there were no local causes of dispute, but the strike orders were not always obeyed, and because of general public reprobation most of these sympathetic demonstrations were short-lived. It was only by deliberate misrepresentation of the issue at stake that the leaders were able to control their following in Winnipeg or to win any considerable support in other cities. The principle of collective bargaining was never in dispute; the actual quarrel was over the recognition of the "One Big Union."

The plans of the leaders were told in the "Western Labor News," which was the only paper permitted to be published in the early days of the strike in Winnipeg. It foretold a general and Dominion-wide strike which would include the postal service and the railways. "Should that be necessary," said this organ of the strike committee, "it will have results that at present are beyond contemplation. The federal Government would have proved its incompetence, and would have to go in a hurry. The present industrial system would also be given its first effective blow. Its end would, because of this, be materially hastened. The financial system would also come in for serious thought, and in the ramifications of the Dominion-wide strike the serious financial condition of the nation would look bare and inadequate also, and its end would be hastened."

This could mean only an attack on the present system of government and the overthrow of the industrial and financial systems of the country, to be replaced, presumably, by a Bolshevik Utopia. The head of the strike organization declared that in a short time there would be no need to use the weapon of the strike. "We shall not need to strike," he said, "when we own and control industry—and we won't relinquish the fight until we do control. This is not revolution. The workers are docile, but the workers realize their importance, and they see no reason why they should not own and enjoy, since they produce all."

The stubborn resistance of the citizens of Winnipeg, fortified by the firm attitude of the Dominion Government toward the striking postal employees, broke the strike where it began; and, once broken in Winnipeg, the movement soon died out elsewhere. A committee of one thousand Winnipeg citizens undertook the operation of the more essential of the public utilities. The Government announced that striking postal employees would be discharged if they did not return to work immediately. Various corporations made similar announcements, and thousands of trade-union men who found that they had been deceived by their new leaders returned to their work. The strike leaders were broken and discredited. Canada is not Russia; Canada will not tolerate Bolshevism. Canadian trade-union men will not tolerate Bolshevism, but thousands were misled for a time by the appeals of the men who were trying to work revolution.

To the credit of the strikers in Winnipeg and other Canadian cities be it said that, although passions ran high and defeat was bitter, there were few riots of any magnitude and little actual damage was done to property. If the extremists had planned anything of this sort, they were overruled by the sober sense of the great majority, who have always had respect for law and order. The truth is that the great majority of the strikers had dropped their tools against their own better judgment. As often happens, the inarticulate majority were overruled and bullied by a noisy and headstrong minority. The issue had been misrepresented. Thousands of law-abiding, loyal, and respectable citizens who have never been led astray by the Bolshevik doctrines of the leaders of the "One Big Union" went on strike believing that they were fighting for the principle of collective bargaining, which is dear to the hearts of all trade-union men. Later they found that this was not the issue, and they were then in an awkward situation. They had been loyal to their leaders, and those leaders had betrayed them. They began then to seek for the easiest way out of their difficulties, the way that would involve the slightest loss of their self-respect.

In other times it would not have been so easy for leaders of the sort who ruled the situation in Winnipeg to gain the confidence of Canadian labor. It was the prevailing discontent over hard conditions of living in this era of abnormal costs of all the necessities of life that enabled a visionary and dangerous minority to work its will with a majority that in ordinary times could not easily have been influenced to disregard its contracts and agreements.

The Hon. G. H. Robertson, Canadian Minister of Labor, is himself a labor leader who has long been prominent in labor circles in the Dominion. Quite naturally his sympathies are with labor in all its worthy attempts to better its conditions. There was considerable criticism from employers when he was selected as Labor Minister. When the trouble commenced in Winnipeg, he hurried to the scene to attempt to secure arbitration. Strong labor leader that he is, he soon came to the conclusion that arbitration was impossible. Any compromise would be a compromise with Bolshevism. On the point at issue there could be no surrender, no compromise, unless the whole financial, industrial, and economic system of Canada were to be changed. He made no attempt, therefore, to secure arbitration. His whole effort was to persuade labor that it had misunderstood the issue. In that attempt he met with a large measure of success.

Before leaving for Ottawa, at a time when the result of the strike was no longer in doubt, he gave an interview to the "Manitoba Free Press," which in the interval had been able to resume publication.

"The promoters of the Winnipeg strike," he said, "now sit in the ashes of their folly. Labor leaders who advocate that only might is right, who hold that law, justice, and honor should be discarded at will, merit and receive the condemnation of all good citizens.

"Sympathetic strikes must always fail. Socialism has chosen the 'One Big Union' idea as a popular primrose path along which to lead the trade-unionist, urging him to discard his honorable obligations and join the big show.

"The Winnipeg strike is the first rehearsal of the play written at Calgary. The Winnipeg rehearsal has cost approximately two million dollars in wages lost in western Canada alone, and has proved the play to have been badly written and unpopular with both the public and most of the performers."

Undoubtedly this striking evidence of public unrest must lead to a serious examination of the economic conditions that made such disturbance in law-abiding communities possible. Two months ago the Canadian Government appointed a commission to investigate the possibilities of an industrial system under which labor would be represented on the boards of big employing corporations and share in the annual profits. That commission is to report some time this month, and legislation of some sort is promised for this session in case the recommendations are favorable. The result may be interesting.

WHAT THE JUGOSLAVS WANT

BY NICHOLAS PASITCH

FIRST DELEGATE TO THE PEACE CONFERENCE OF THE KINGDOM OF SERBS, CROATS, AND SLOVENES

AN AUTHORIZED INTERVIEW WITH GREGORY MASON, OF THE OUTLOOK STAFF

WILL the Balkans, which have provided the sparks for most of the wars Europe has had in the past half-century, produce a casus belli in the issues between the Yugoslavs and the Italians which have arisen on the very eve of the settlement of the great war between Germany and the Allies?

Before this can be published some arrangement may have been concluded between the Italians and the Yugoslavs; but will that arrangement be permanently satisfactory to both sides?

The Teutons, who dragged the whole world into war by refusing to arbitrate their quarrel with the Slavs in the Balkans, are openly exulting over the Balkan controversy which has broken out between Slavs and Latins. The sagest observers of politics in the chancelleries of Allied states are frank in declaring there can be no secure peace in Europe until the dispute affecting Fiume and Dalmatia is settled to the satisfaction of both parties to the dispute. As I write this such a settlement seems about as hopeless of attainment as a settlement between France and Germany which would please both of them. It would seem that there must be developed a willingness to compromise in the hearts of both parties to this controversy before the Peace Conference can adjourn with a fair prospect of a stable peace for Europe. Whatever may be the position of the Italians, the Yugoslavs are preserving a commendable composure, to judge by the attitude of their delegates in Paris. I recently went to see Mr. Nicholas Pasitch, First Delegate of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes to the Peace Conference. Mr. Pasitch is a handsome old man with fine big eyes, straight nose, and full beard. He looks like a very distinguished Santa Claus. The interview was arranged by Professor Pavle Popovitch, of the University of Belgrade, and the head of the Press Department of the Yugoslavic Delegation to the Conference. Mr. Bogumil Vosenjak, the General Secretary of the Delegation, acted as interpreter.

"Above all, I want to emphasize," said Mr. Pasitch, "the fact that we do not consider the Italians our enemies. We want always to preserve good relations with Italy and to remain a friendly neighbor of hers. Even if ever it should come to a war, you can be sure that in no case would it ever be we who would provoke it, and that we shall always do everything possible to prevent that possibility and to avoid everything which might result in placing on us any responsibility for such an event.

"Such a war would benefit only our common enemies; a reasonable policy ought to commend itself to the two nations in order to avoid a war, and indeed to suppress anything tending even to weaken the friendship between the two peoples.

"Germany sowed distrust among us in the Balkans," continued the distinguished first delegate of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, "as well as distrust between Europe and us, and this all with the single aim of justifying her animosity toward us and her rigorous measures to keep us in a state of servitude. Now, sir, every people has the right to defend its liberty and its national development. The peoples who have had to support the yoke of foreign domination have conceived such a hatred for the policy of enslavement and despoilment of other people's land that they would never themselves think of adopting such an imperialistic policy. We are a peaceful people, we have never enslaved foreign tribes or nationalities.

"All that the Yugoslavs want is to unite, to be free, and to consecrate all their intellectual and material forces solely to their development and their progress. Thus you see that even at present they are asking only for what belongs to them; they demand only the realization of the very principles which you have proclaimed, you Americans, as a base for international life in the future."

Mr. Pasitch swept some papers off his desk with a broad sweep of the right hand and sat more erect in his chair. "Of course you are familiar with the issues between us and Italy," said he; "but let me give you a reiteration of our position. We Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes demand only this—that the settlement of this question be made on national lines. As far as the port of Fiume is concerned, the Italian claim is specious if you are ignorant, but that is all that can be said for it. Fiume belongs to us by every standard—by the ethnographic standard, the historic standard, and by the economic standard.

"The Italianization of Fiume is very recent. Personally I can remember when Fiume was overwhelmingly Slavic. The introduction of the Italians was promoted by the Magyars as a political maneuver against the Croats.

"To-day the Italians are claiming that they have thirty-three thousand of their people in Fiume as against less than eleven thousand Yugoslavs. I don't know where they find any justification for such figures. The official Austro-Hungarian statistics for 1910 report 24,212 Italians and 15,687 Yugoslavs. But even those figures are misleading. They were compiled and published by the municipal authorities of Fiume, who were either Magyars or Italians, with every reason to make Slavic strength in their city appear as slight as possible. But there are still two important points to be remembered. First, included in that 24,212 are Italianisanti or Italianized Slavs. In the second place, both the Italian and Magyar statisticians count the population of Fiume as if Susak were not properly included. Now Susak, which is divided from so-called Fiume by only a narrow canal, is as much a part of real Fiume as the city just north of the Harlem River is a part of real New York. In Susak there are 11,706 Yugoslavs as against 658 Italians. Therefore in greater Fiume there are altogether 27,393 Yugoslavs as against 24,870 Italians.

"For economic reasons it is a matter almost of life and death for us to have Fiume. With its fine rail connections this port serves the very heart and, indeed, the whole interior of our country. Look at the other ports which might be available to us. Ragusa (Dubrovnik) is linked with the interior only by a narrow-gauge railway. Ogulin-Knin has no connection with our capital. It is true that Spalato (Split) is a good harbor which may be connected with Belgrade. But even if that railway is built, it will be a tremendously expensive task and one which cannot be accomplished for a long time.

"In short, Fiume is indispensable to us. It is not indispensable to Italy. If our trade had to pass through an Italian Fiume, Italy would hold our whole commerce in her hands. She could blockade us when she pleased. For us that would be a situation not to be borne. We rest our claim to Fiume, however, not on questions of expediency but on questions of principle. By the fundamental principle of the self-determination of peoples, Fiume belongs to the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes.

"Even now, in our conflict with Italy, we are asking for arbitration, we are putting the solution up to the judgment of your just and eminent President, but our adversaries will not accept the judgment of just men. We are asking that the people themselves be allowed to decide by a plebiscite what they want and to whom they wish to unite themselves. The Italians will not accept even that. Or, rather, they are ready to accept the suggestion that Fiume shall decide her own fate by a plebiscite, but they refuse their right of this same plebiscite to the villages in the immediate proximity of Fiume.

"An issue is thus raised between the principles proclaimed already, in the name of which this war has been conducted against violence and imperialism, and secret treaties based on the law of conquest.

"The conflict must be decided between two parties, of which one defends justice and the liberty of all peoples, and of which the other is actuated by secret treaties, by the ideas and tendencies of outworn imperialism. Jugoslavism, formed in accordance with modern political ideas, has entered this fight. Now the struggle is on no longer between us, the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, and Italy, but between the ancient world and the modern world, between the force of imperialism and discredited secret treaties on the one hand, and liberty and the law of nations on the other. Crude force and Teutonic imperialism have been conquered; we have commenced the creation of a durable peace on the basis of right and liberty."

I asked his Excellency about the possibilities of a compromise by which the Jugoslavs, in exchange for Fiume, would give up a good deal of Dalmatia.

"That," said he, "would be like asking a father to sacrifice the lives of six sons in order to save the seventh. Our right to Dalmatia is even more unmistakable than our right to Fiume. If you mark the Slavic population of Dalmatia in white and indicate on the map in black the spots where there are Italian majorities, you will find the map of Dalmatia is an expanse of white with a few fly specks along the coast. By the official census of 1910 there were in Dalmatia 610,669 Serbo-Croats and 18,028 Italians. Here, as in Fiume, some of the people counted as Italians are merely Italianized Slavs. Yet, including these, not more than three per cent of the people of Dalmatia are speaking Italian. If the friends of Italy have any doubt about our claim as to what constitutes justice for Dalmatia and Fiume, let them call for a plebiscite. Let the inhabitants of those regions themselves decide their fate. But there's the difficulty; you cannot get any Italian to consent to such a test."

"No enemy of Italy," continued Mr. Pasitch, "could devise a better way to do her serious injury than to give her what she is now asking for. We Jugoslavs who have fought shoulder to shoulder with the brave Italians count ourselves their friends. Are the Italian people so blind as not to see that in its claim for territory on the east coast of the Adriatic, as in its claims to the Greek-inhabited islands of the Dodecanese, the Italian Government is moved by the baldest imperialism? Give Italy what the Italian Government is asking for, and you give the Italians the enmity of twenty million Slavs and Greeks who would like to be their friends."

"Speaking of the Greeks, another Balkan people, your Excellency, what is your opinion of the desirability and practicability of a union of the Balkan States?" I asked.

"It is out of the question for us to consider any union with Bulgaria now," the distinguished Serb replied, emphatically. "Bulgaria has carved into our country wounds that years will not heal. But, what is more, Bulgaria's treacherous action in siding with the Central Powers in the late war is not the first instance of a fundamental aptitude for treachery and deceit in Bulgarian character."

"By the way," he asked, with a twinkle in his eye, "wasn't there some admiration for Bulgaria in America before the war?"

"I used to hear some Americans speak rather admiringly of the Bulgarians as 'the Prussians of the Balkans,'" I replied, with a laugh; "but I don't believe that comparison nor any other form of laudation for Bulgaria is in the mouths of Americans now."

"I should think not," said Mr. Pasitch, laughing also; "the world has had enough of Prussianism; and as for the Bulgarians, they are, if anything, more cruel and less efficient than the Prussians of Prussia. It is very important to us to be adequately protected against any future aggression from Bulgaria. Some rectification of frontiers is absolutely necessary. Look on the map and see how close to the Bulgarian frontier in places runs the railway from Belgrade to Salonika. In 1914 Bulgars swarmed across their border and raided that line many, many times. We Serbians are asking that the frontier shall be pushed back farther from that railway line. We are also asking, for the same reasons, that a tiny bit of territory all along the Serbian-Bulgarian frontier should be given to us, a territory comprising Vidin, Custendil, Petrich. And in claiming this we are in accord with the principle of nationality, because this territory is not inhabited by Bulgars but by so-called 'Shopes,' who are more like Serbians than like Bulgars. You have seen by a recent telegram published in several French newspapers that the inhabitants of that territory, especially those of Vidin, are in revolt against the Bulgarian Government, and are anxious—as they say themselves—to be included in the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes."

"But, leaving the Bulgarians out of the question," I suggested, "what do you think of the desirability of a union among the other states of the Balkans?"

"I am heartily in favor of it," was the reply. "A union to include Greece, Rumania, and perhaps the Czechoslovaks, besides my own people, would have many advantages for all. First, however, it is to be hoped that certain questions between the Serbs and the Rumanians will be satisfactorily settled. One might have supposed that this Peace Conference was called merely to make peace between the Allies and the Teutonic Powers. The Rumanians, however, have proceeded on the assumption that the Peace Conference was ready and able to settle every political question in Europe. And they have dragged up an issue between them and us. This concerns the future of the country called the Banat. The eastern frontier of the Banat runs between Serbia and Rumania. The northern frontier runs between Serbia and Hungary. The Rumanians are claiming the whole Banat. We claim that it ought to be divided between them and us, on the principle of the self-determination of peoples. The eastern part of the Banat, which is mountainous, has a majority of Rumanians, but the west, which is flat country, has a preponderance of Serbs. And where there are Rumanians living among the Serbs they are the descendants of those who were welcomed by the Slavic inhabitants when they came down from the mountains. In those days both Serbs and Rumanians feared the Hungarians. Thus those early Serbs never thought that in welcoming their Rumanian neighbors they were permitting the growth of a Rumanian claim which would some day be pressed against their descendants. If the Rumanians were given all the territory they are asking for, they would be immediate neighbors of our capital, Belgrade. They suggest that we move our capital. Rather unreasonable advice, don't you think?"

In response to a question about the position of Rumanians who are settled in Serbia proper, Mr. Pasitch said:

"There are not more than 120,000 of these people, although Rumanian publicists sometimes claim there are half a million. They are the descendants of Rumanians who were liberated from the Turks after fighting shoulder to shoulder with Serbs. They are quite satisfied to live in Serbia, for their economic position is much better than it would be in Rumania. Under us each man owns his piece of land; but in Rumania, as you know, there are so many vast estates owned by the aristocracy that great masses of the people are landless. For that very reason Serbia is much safer from Bolshevism than Rumania. As a matter of fact, I believe Bolshevism is impossible in Serbia. We have very little industry, being almost entirely an agricultural country, and we are a pure democracy. There are not more than ten men in Serbia who own more than a thousand hectares of land, and about five hectares to each peasant is the average."

I asked Mr. Pasitch for his opinion as to the future of Bolshevism in the world as a whole. He replied without hesitation:

"I believe Bolshevism everywhere is on the wane. I believe that even in Russia and Germany it is losing power. The reason I believe the world has little more to fear from Bolshevism is that I think the world has at last realized that Bolshevism, for all its extravagances, is fundamentally a protest against institutions and conditions which ought to be changed. The world has no more room for imperialistic Kaisers and Czars. In most parts of the civilized world people have reached a state of development where there is no longer any excuse for denying them the right to govern themselves. And this right is applicable in industry and agriculture as well as in politics. We Serbians are right in not tolerating the existence of a great landed aristocracy. You Americans are right in contending that such gigantic industrial combinations as you have in your country ought to be subject to some kind of regulation by your Government."

Is there not a good deal of truth in that remark of Mr. Pasitch, with which he closed the interview? Is it not true that "Bolshevism, for all its extravagances, is fundamentally a protest against institutions and conditions which ought to be changed"? Is there no significance in the fact that the two countries which have suffered most from Bolshevism, Russia and Germany, are the two countries where there was formerly the highest degree of political tyranny? If this be so, then while Americans preserve their intelligence and the spirit of social justice in which their country was founded they need never fear Bolshevism.

IMPRESSIONS OF A MODERN LEGISLATURE

BY FREDERICK M. DAVENPORT

Combining theory and practice in government, Mr. Davenport has both conducted college courses in political science and served in public office. He is Professor of Law and Civil Polity in Hamilton College and is a Republican Senator in the New York Legislature. In The Outlook for June 4 there was an article by him under the title "Vested Stupidity in Property and Politics," indicating the political significance of the human welfare measures which were introduced into the Legislature, but rejected.—THE EDITORS.

ISERVED first in the State Senate at Albany in the old Hughes days, now some ten years gone. There were then strong men in the leadership of the Legislature, who, whatever their defects, sought to protect in the public eye the dignity and prestige of the body over which they ruled. In the Senate there were two powerful Democratic leaders and two powerful Republican leaders. It was the day of frequent bipartisan understandings. On important matters these four were the whole works. The Tammany of that day was open, crude, and human; cold and relentless only when the Tammany interest or the interest of the particular friends of Tammany was intimately involved. The Republican leadership was able, astute, much less human, and much more consistently selfish. Important property interests had particular friends, and now and then a lightning flash of investigation disclosed ramifications of predatory privilege. But it was controlled and dignified and never obtunded too much upon the landscape. In fact, the old system of thoroughly entrenched property interest government was already well on the way to decline.

The old system of the well-organized intervention of the property interest in legislative affairs grew up partly as a by-product of the protection of the property interest against legislative "strikers" of the meaner sort who introduced bills dangerous to business progress and threatened to press them to passage. As a strong and unified party organization developed, business found that it could handle its legislative difficulties and desires most effectively through the man at the top. Under Platt capitalism was frankly in the saddle, and it was capitalist government which had long offended public opinion in the State of New York and was on the wane when Hughes took up his so-called fight with the bosses. The theory, somewhat imperfect and impractical as it turned out, was that the bosses represented the insurance companies, the race-track gamblers, and were responsible for the "isles of privilege" which Hughes once referred to as rocky dangers in the current of legislation. The theory was that the influence behind the bosses would not let go until the boss was compelled to let go.

The great Hughes battle for the popularizing of politics and the freeing of it from its predatory entanglements was not in a formal sense successful, although in a larger sense it was; and the Governor retired to the cloister of the Supreme Court in Washington, relieved of what seemed to have become an intolerable burden of friction and opposition. In a genuine and just sense no truer friend of the property interest ever sat in the Governor's chair than Hughes; but the property interest, which has so much at stake when government is bad, for the most part followed the line of least resistance, did little to help Hughes, and stood idly by while the existing system baited him to something approaching despair.

The fight against Hughes, and later against Roosevelt, who, as a private citizen, at Hughes's request, took up the battle in the State upon substantially similar issues, aroused such popular resentment that the Republicans went out of power in New York and remained out for years. In fact, they are by no means altogether back yet. Pressed on by a popular revolution, a Tammany Legislature conferred the doubtful boon of an irresponsible sort of direct primary control upon the voters of the parties. The conservative influences of the State did not sufficiently support the Hughes direct primary plan, which in substance was far wiser than the one finally adopted, as it provided for responsible leadership as well as popular control over what is the most vital and important feature of government. The Hughes plan provided in substance for a State Convention of directly elected representatives to furnish a responsible unity and responsible suggestions of candidates to the party voters, who themselves then on primary day passed upon the suggestions, as well as upon any other suggestions about candidates made by unorganized petitioning groups.

The declining vigor of Republican politics in the last ten years is accounted for by the failure of the conservative interests to rise to the level of wisdom and vision which Roosevelt and Hughes offered the party, and which the ruling caste within the party incontinently spurned. The ruling mind behind the Republican organization in those days had real strength and much more potential capacity for statesmanship than has since been shown, but it was clouded by personal antipathies and rendered inflexible by hard and fast individualistic philosophy. The result of it all was that the most powerful stream of tendency within the State has been Democratic in the last ten years rather than Republican. And it has not been fortunate for the State. There has been a curious mixture of good and evil in political progress. The Dix and Sulzer administrations were depressing to the last degree, the one in its rapid weakness and the other in its demagoguery and hypocrisy. Governor Glynn was an able and resourceful man handicapped by the circumstances in which he succeeded Sulzer in high office. There has been advance during these years, particularly in the development of what is, on the whole, a fine code of labor legislation. But while government has become more democratic, it has also become more demagogic, more emotionalized, more restricted to narrowing issues and a narrower leadership. The whole situation being uncontrolled by responsible political intelligence, the onrush during the last decade of the labor and woman influences into party politics is in danger of begetting a political tendency toward "giving the people what they want" at the moment, whether a wise measure of deliberation would mark it as good for them or not.

Returning to the Senate at Albany after an absence of nearly ten years, I have been impressed with some of the changes which the decade has brought. Tammany is chastened, and I think improved in its relation to the public welfare. The Whitman administration, with some outstanding virtues, but having lost a measure of public confidence as it sank to its setting, is replaced in the Executive Chamber by the best type of the modern Tammany product. Tammany seems to have sloughed off the taste for contractor's graft and similar political garbage which so defiled it in its State and municipal reputation only a few years ago. If you ask an intelligent Tammany man about it, he will tell you, "We mean to keep in power by giving the people what they want." Giving the people what they seem to want at the moment, without let or hindrance, without examination or discrimination, may easily pass into the renunciation of intelligent leadership, without which democracy cannot long survive.

In general the Senate at Albany, and I have no doubt the Assembly, is made up of earnest and conscientious men, but the responsible system of control is by no means as strong as it once was. I attribute it in part to the disintegrating effect of the wildcat form of direct primary, and in part to the continuing stupidity and short-sightedness of the outside business and property groups in the handling of their affairs at the Capitol. Other lobbying groups are not altogether blameless, but for the most part the others lack organized capacity to deflect legislation from its normal course. Responsible control being absent, the pressure of active lobbying seems to have greatly increased. In the rather independent-minded Senate it brought about toward the end of the last session a considerable measure of irritation, and outbursts of indignation against it were not uncommon.

I recall the impotent result of the attempt to pass a thoroughly good bill requiring certain feed manufacturers to print on the outside of the bag the ingredients of the feed sold to farmers. This powerful feed group were openly charged with having mixed oat hulls and the sweepings of elevator floors with molasses as a heavy and unnutritive ingredient. And I recall the only partially smothered protests of the chairman of the committee having the bill in charge against the skillful lobby which had befuddled the situation to the benefit of private profit.

The fiasco of the attempt of the traction group to achieve increase of fares through the futile maneuvers surrounding the urging of the Carson-Martin Bill upon the Legislature has already been described in these columns.

And the lobby for the so-called Water Company Bill, which on the surface seemed to be harmlessly drawn to put the water corporations under the control of the Public Service Commission, was roundly denounced in open Senate for its methods of pressure and also for its sinuous ways. "A crafty piece of bill drafting," said the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. "It does not look right and it is not right. Whoever was guiding this bill through these legislative halls intended to mislead. There is something bad back of this bill."

Another property group subtly fought the human welfare measures, like the Living Wage Bill and the Health Insurance Bill and the Eight-hour Bill for women, and aided powerfully in accomplishing the final defeat of these measures. After the bills had passed the Senate, this property group fell into something approaching panic, and on the morning of the day before the measures were to be taken up by the Republican conference in the Assembly—as a result of preconcerted organized action, foremen and officials in the mills and factories in strategic parts of the up-State country were sent quickly among the employees to secure, in some instances apparently through gross misrepresentation of its actual character, many thousands of signatures against one of these measures from the very people who would be most wholesomely benefited. And then by further preconcerted action the petitions were shipped en masse the same afternoon on the Empire State Express to Albany to be used as a means of influencing the minds of Republicans in the Assembly! This same property group vigorously opposed in subtle ways all these human welfare measures. I was interested especially in the health insurance measure, as it was intended to be for the benefit of the great body of workers and their dependents generally in the State, and I soon began to receive letters like the following, all of which came to me without the slightest personal solicitation:

Dear Senator:

Regarding the enclosed newspaper slip [telling about the petitions], I wish to state the following:

As an employee in one of the knitting mills, I felt that it was unfair for all the workers to sign these petitions when they knew practically nothing about them.

The workers almost as a whole did not understand this bill. . . .

These petitions came from the office and were not put out by the factory workers. You can imagine who it is that is anxious not to have the bill passed.

If the workers understood the benefits of the bill, I believe they would have never signed the petition. While I do not thoroughly understand the bill myself, from what I know of the bills you usually introduce, I believe you are honestly and faithfully representing the people. I felt like making a protest to the workers about signing the petition, but it might cost me my job, and I am taking a chance in writing this letter, so if you want to know anything else about the matter I can arrange to see you when you are in this vicinity.

Furthermore, I am a discharged soldier, having returned recently from France, and I wish to uphold the democracy that we went over there to fight for. Therefore I could not refrain from writing you on this matter, as I believe it to be for the benefit of the working people. Sincerely,

P. S. If you can send me a complete copy of your bill, I would be pleased to have it. Also if my name were known in connection with this letter, it might cost me my job.

Nothing could more clearly depict the subtle and powerful organized coercion of working-class opinion than this interesting letter.

As indicating the political advantage which is taken of these clever ruses, I quote now from the letter of a high Republican party official, which in substance was sent far and wide through the State:

I regret that the minimum wage and health insurance bills did not meet the approval of the great majority of Republican Assemblymen. That does not mean that they are opposed to the forward movement, but that they did not think these particular measures were demanded by the working people at this time. They were strengthened in their position by a test vote of men and women mill workers, showing 13,200 opposed to health insurance, and 112 in favor.

All very clever—is it not?

This is only one example of the method of astute and organized opposition made use of to defeat for the time being adequate consideration of these measures. It is no doubt also true that the eager, opposing lobby on the humanitarian side, while animated by a far more unselfish spirit, may to a certain extent bewilder and distract the minds of members in a legislature who are anxious in the main to do what is right and wise. But a powerful "business" lobby, especially if it has at all a privileged entry to the centers of legislative influence, backed by skillful organization and wealth, can drive a coach and four through a legislative body, overburdened and distraught in trying to find within a hundred days of legislative life a solution to many intricate problems. Especially is this true if the party system itself is in process of disintegration. And there need be neither corruption nor illegality nor even technical impropriety from the standpoint of the existing rules about lobbying.

The system of lobbying in legislative halls in America ought to be sharply scrutinized and modified. The lobbyist ought to be put under strict rules, and in the event of a clearly substantial and deliberate misrepresentation made to a member of the Legislature or any committee, or in the event of the use of deceptive and disingenuous methods, should be subject to a penalty similar to the penalty of disbarment which a lawyer suffers when he misrepresents facts to the court. The modern lobbyist holds a more intimate relation to the course of legislation and to the ultimate effect of it than either the lawyer or the judge. The lobbyist is in a position to tamper effectively with law at its source. This particular fraternity have so conducted themselves in the past that their profession is regarded as a degradation and not a distinction. This is altogether sinister from the standpoint of the public interest. Instead of a lobbyist being a person to be pointed at in legislative corridors as an object of suspicion and derision, only honest and able minds from business and professional circles and other groups of parties in interest should be allowed to act in so important a capacity.

The effect of the present lobbying system upon legislative morale is debasing. I heard several excellent men in both houses express themselves towards the end of the session as eager to relinquish public office under such an environment. And the reputation of parliamentary bodies suffers immeasurably in public esteem. "Do you know how we at home look upon the activities of the Legislature this winter?" said a constituent to me when I got back to my district. "We look upon it as a joke, just a plain joke." Well, it is a dangerous joke, no matter in what part of the country the symptoms appear. A bungling attempt at property control on the one hand, and a tendency merely to pander to great groups of voters on the other hand, together may easily engender the spirit of Bolshevism in any civilization. In fact, these are th-two elements that are producing Bolshevism throughout the world.

Of course there is no certain panacea for such a complicated political disorder. And there is no reason to believe that the disorder is confined to the State of New York. Similar symptoms appear about other State capitols. I do not believe that the voters of the country will give up the substance of the direct primary system of controlling nomination to important public office; but I do not see how unity of party purpose and an opportunity for the leadership of deliberation can once more be obtained except by combining some form of a responsible State convention with the direct primary, somewhat as Governor Hughes planned for it ten years ago in the State of New York.

As for the intricate system of subtle pressure known as modern lobbying, it ought to be quietly and carefully studied and checked by the legislatures themselves, not by spectacular investigations and smelling committees calculated to produce an exaggerated and erroneous impression, but in the spirit of doing what is wisest for good government as well as for the various parties in interest who are affected by pending legislation.

These parties ought to be given every opportunity, under proper safeguards, to furnish intelligent and accurate information; but the whole unfair practice of subtle, powerful, deceptive pressure ought to be made difficult, if not impossible.

The party legislative caucus, now employed chiefly as a means of tying in members upon a proposal which of their own free wills they would not adopt, should give way to the party conference in which a genuine meeting of minds, if one can be procured, follows upon free discussion. Any other sort of meeting of minds for purposes of party unity is not worth having from the standpoint of good government and progress. The old mechanical caucus rule is a form of narrow Prussianism, long out of touch with the underlying spirit of American politics and the American people.

Increased salaries to State legislators would, I believe, bring favorable results out of proportion to the additional cost. "Only chicken-feed!" is the comment of the astute Charles F. Murphy upon the stipend of the Solons in the State Capitol. Reasonably well-paid men would from every point of view become better public servants.

It may be, and probably is, more or less of a coincidence that the vast growth of public expenditure in some of our commonwealths has gone on side by side with the deterioration in the system of political control. Anyway, it is becoming rapidly clearer to the relatively wasteful and improvident American people that a thoroughgoing budget system for the municipality and the State, as well as the Nation, is vital to a better governmental order. This realization has become acute in proportion as the system of taxation has become dominantly direct rather than indirect. It must be just as true in public as in private enterprise that a way can be found to check the vastly increased governmental expenditures of the last twenty years. If there is no way, then the future of democracy is dark.

I have attempted to draw what has been in the main an impressionist picture of the last decade of our politics in New York, and of certain existing defects in our governmental system, not with the purpose of condemning the excellent men with whom I am associated and for whom I have a warm regard, but because I believe that in a better legislative environment their capacity and earnestness would have opportunity to be of greater benefit to the State.

DOUGLAS STEWART—HIGHLANDER

BY JEAN CARTER COCHRANE

Not long ago a friend recounted to me the story of Mrs. Stewart's lonely vigil. It struck me as one of the most pathetic incidents I had heard during the war, and I have written it down that others might have the inspiration of it. The first part of the story was given me in bare outline, but the last part is in the exact words of my friend.—THE AUTHOR.

WE Scotch are a "dour folk." Our sorrows and our joys find no outward expression, but they strike deeper into our very being for that reason, and we look with envy upon those who are more easily moved to tears or laughter than ourselves. No race has given more freely of its own to the world war than the Scotch, and the unprinted book of their heroisms, their self-sacrifice, and their tragedies will probably never be published; but what reading it would make!

My own part in this crisis has been a peculiar one, unimportant and with no glory attached, and yet it has wrung my soul. My husband is the minister of a Scotch community in a manufacturing town in England, and it has been our portion to work among these people and help them when the bad news came of a son wounded or taken prisoner, and at times even to bring word of his death to those waiting anxiously in their homes. No pen can do justice to the beauty of character that has been revealed on such occasions, when some reserved man or woman has broken through the custom of years and showed the love that was burning in his or her heart for those who can never return.

Lads that my husband has christened and who were the hope of our church now lie beneath the scarlet poppies on Flanders fields. Will any one say that the minister's heart does not ache too, now that the war is over and almost every family has a vacant seat in the pew where Charlie or Donald used to be?

How I wish I could make vivid the house where Mrs. Stewart lived—although one might pass it every day with never a glance, it was so exactly like the other houses in the same row. The tiny doorstep and the little bow window with the geraniums in it and the coarse white curtains told no story of particular refinement or culture, but if one was interested in details one might notice that the brass of the front door-plate and the knocker shone like gold, and that no finger-marks marred the woodwork. Humble it would certainly look to you and me, but it was home to Douglas and his mother. They never talked to any one of their affection for each other, although sometimes Mrs. Stewart would say when he was away, with a shamefaced look at being caught praising him:

"Yes, Douglas is a good, steady lad;" and then, as an afterthought: "He should be; he had a good father and he is the last to carry on the race."

We were absent on our holiday when the war broke out, and, as traveling was stopped for troop trains, we could not return for several weeks. Shortly after we were settled at home I went to call on Mrs. Stewart, for I felt she would take the war hard because Douglas was her only child and he was not the sort of lad to remain behind.

The knocker was as bright as usual and there was only a second's delay until Mrs. Stewart stood in front of me. She led me into the tiny parlor in which she and Douglas had taken such pleasure. To many people the room might have seemed ordinary, but to one who knew the love it contained it was beautiful and homelike. One glance at the mother's face told the story.

"Douglas has not gone already?" I asked. "An only son who supports his mother should be the last to go."

"He could do nothing else," she answered, proudly, as though she was slightly nettled at the implied criticism. "The Stewarts have always been among the first to offer themselves when their country was in danger; I would not have him less brave than his fathers. I have a little money laid by in the bank against a rainy day or the time when Douglas is married, and I will take that. Could I have him stay behind and know that this money was waiting to be used?"

I checked the words that rose to my lips, "What if he should be killed?" for in those days we did not admit to each other that such a thing could happen to any one we knew—the fighting would be over too soon for that.

She seemed to see the thought in my eyes, however, and a shiver went through her, but she changed the subject by talking of how well he looked in his uniform, and how the training was developing him physically.

"It is better for him than being all day over the weary books in the office—he was growing round-shouldered; the Stewarts should be out in the heather, not stooping over accounts. He likes it all fine. He came in one night, two days after war was declared, and he leaned over and kissed me; you know, we do not often do that, so I understood what it meant." She put a hand to her heart as she spoke, as though a sword was piercing it. "The regiment is called out, mother, and I have to go. You know I have to go, don't you?"

"I nodded, for I was so surprised I could scarcely speak, but at length I held up my head and said, 'Yes, Douglas, you could do nothing else; you will have to go!'"

"Will he leave soon?" I asked; for reports of the Allied retreat through Belgium had been received that morning and I knew that the volunteer regiments were being rushed to the front.

"I do not know exactly. He spent last evening with me, and something in his manner told me we would not have another, but he was reticent about their orders, as they are not allowed to tell. I asked him if he had no sweetheart that he would like to say good-by to, but he answered, 'You are the only sweetheart I have ever had, mother.' They say that at this time it is the mothers the boys cling to above all others," she continued, proudly.

The next morning when I was in town I heard that the — Scottish were to march through in the course of an hour. It was Douglas's regiment, so I took up my position on the steps of the City Hall and waited. I had no time to get word to his mother, but I supposed she had been informed. I watched the people collect, and they were so interesting that I had no chance to grow tired. It was a hopeful and brave crowd, but there was no elation, for word had just been spread of the terrible slaughter that was going on across the Channel, and we began to realize that the lads were, many of them, going abroad to die.

On the opposite side of the street, some distance away, my eyes were attracted to the slight figure of a woman, decently dressed, who seemed alone in the crowd. She paid no heed to what went on around her, but listened intently to the pipes that were coming up the street. Suddenly it came over me that it was Mrs. Stewart, and that she was waiting to wave good-by to Douglas. The band came nearer, and then the gallant lads appeared, and I eagerly watched Mrs. Stewart, for I knew I could tell by her expression when Douglas arrived. She leaned forward anxiously to be sure not to miss him, clutching a handkerchief in her hand. Suddenly her face lighted, she drew herself proudly to her full height, and the bravest, most beautiful smile I have ever seen illuminated her features like a glory. Douglas passed so near that she might have stroked him with her hand, and an answering smile touched his lips, though he could not turn his head; but his figure straightened, his head went higher, his step grew firmer, his mother's courage had added to his own. But when the regiment had passed and there were no more lads to be heartened I shall never forget how the glory died out of that mother's face and a look of unutterable despair and grief took its place, for the light of her life had gone out. It was only for a moment, then she recovered herself and resumed her expression of quiet resignation. I tried to hurry to her, but the crowd was too great, and before I could reach the place she had slipped away in the press.

Three years dragged their slow length heavily away, and Douglas, by some miracle, had escaped. He had been through Ypres and every engagement after, and almost all of his regiment had been wiped out. Three times he had been home on furlough, and after he had gone his mother told us proudly of the medals he had won and what his officers said of him. To us he would never talk of himself, but his last words as he left would be a request that we would "have an eye to mother."

"Mother" certainly needed it, for the years were treating her hardly, and she was aging perceptibly. Who would not grow old with such a dread at her heart? She never heard the postman's whistle but what she wondered, "Has he brought bad news to-day?" And in the long watches of the wakeful nights she would listen to the moan of the wind and think of Douglas up to his knees in the water of the trenches, and would sit up in bed to do one more row on the socks she was knitting him, for her laddie must not be cold for lack of comforts that she could make. On other nights she would listen to some lone footsteps on the street, and wait with dread until it had passed her door, for might it not be some one bringing the fateful telegram?

"Mrs. Stewart is wearying for Douglas," my husband would say with a shake of the head. "Will this wicked war never end?" And he would start on his rounds to try and bring courage and comfort to hearts where courage and comfort were burning low.

At last, a year ago in November, the message came. It was short, with not an extra word in it—"Douglas Stewart missing on the field of battle."

Of course we hurried at once to his mother, and found her still undaunted.

"They did not say killed," she exclaimed. "I will not give him up until I hear definitely that he is gone, for there are a thousand things that could have happened. I shall keep the home as though he might return at any moment."

We left no stone unturned to find some trace of Douglas. My husband fairly haunted the offices where intelligence about missing men was gathered and pulled every wire, to no purpose. Eleven months of waiting passed without a word, and we began to feel that no news would ever come, but Douglas's mother would not give up hope.

One Sunday in the following October, one month before the armistice was signed, I noticed that Mrs. Stewart's place in church was vacant. As she was as regular as clockwork, I determined to go as soon as possible and find out the reason for her absence. Her son's parting request to "keep an eye on mother" was always in my mind.

Unfortunately, the next day was so full I could not manage to get away, and early on Tuesday afternoon Mrs. Stewart herself called. I knew the instant I looked at her that she had received the tidings she had dreaded for the last four years—Douglas was dead. She read in my expression what I knew.

Quite calmly she told me how the word had reached her on Friday, and that, though she had tried to get up and come to church on Sunday, she had found herself so weak that she had decided to stay in bed.

"You see, I had to be in town on Monday, for I wrote to the business office where my boy worked about what had happened, and they sent a very kind note, saying the flag would be at half-mast for him on Monday afternoon."

"Did you go?" I asked, stupidly enough, for of course she had gone.

"Yes, I told no one, but just slipped in and stood at the corner, and there was the flag at half-mast while all the other flags were mast-high. As I stood there it just seemed the last thing I could do for my boy, and it was all over now. A gentleman passing by saw me crying and looked at me so hard, and I just wanted to say, 'That is in honor of my only child, the last of his race.'"

It was hard to comfort such sorrow as this, and yet Mrs. Stewart's heroism and the courage of all the mothers makes one look forward with hope and confidence to the future of the world.

WEEKLY OUTLINE STUDY OF CURRENT HISTORY

BY J. MADISON GATHANY, A.M.

HOPE STREET HIGH SCHOOL, PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Based on The Outlook of June 11, 1919

Each week an Outline Study of Current History based on the preceding number of The Outlook will be printed for the benefit of current events classes, debating clubs, teachers of history and of English, and the like, and for use in the home and by such individual readers as may desire suggestions in the serious study of current history.—THE EDITORS.

[Those who are using the weekly outline should not attempt to cover the whole of an outline in any one lesson or study. Assign for one lesson selected questions, one or two propositions for discussion, and only such words as are found in the material assigned. Or distribute selected questions among different members of the class or group and have them report their findings to all when assembled. Then have all discuss the questions together.]

I—INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

A. Topic: Austria Before the Judges;
The Austrian Terms.

Reference: Page 223.

Questions:

1. From what The Outlook says on this topic select the most significant items about Austria and the Austrian terms. 2. Give with reasons your opinion of the following comment: "Austria is not being dismembered. She has always been dismembered. The peace terms merely record a process already completed." 3. Supply facts from Austrian history that seem to justify this statement: "Division, hatred, distrust, misunderstanding—these were the foundations of the Austrian Empire." 4. The Peace Conference has not published the indemnity and military clauses of the Austrian treaty. Tell what, in your opinion, some of these clauses should contain. Should Austria be made to pay as much as Germany? Reasons. 5. Has Austria ever rendered important service to civilization? Discuss. 6. What do you think the significance of the organization of the Rhine Republic is? 7. There are those who believe that the opposition of France to the union of Austria and Germany is based on misapprehension. The Outlook evidently disagrees with this point of view. Discuss both view-points and then tell what your own personal opinion is. Is there any basis at all in believing that the Germans of the Rhineland will bear watching? 8. A good interpretation of the forces of disruption at work in Austria-Hungary is found in von Schierbrand's "Austria-Hungary: The Polyglot Empire" (Stokes). Read also "South-eastern Europe," by V. R. Sovié (Revell).

B. Topic: The Mexican Revolutionists;
A Villain Unchanged; The Kaiser and the Law.

Reference: Pages 223, 224; 225; 228.

Questions:

1. Restate what The Outlook reports on the Mexican revolutionists. 2. Discuss whether the United States should aid any faction in Mexico. 3. What, in your opinion, do the long years of lawlessness in Mexico teach? 4. One writer says that "Mexico must set her own house in order." Tell Mexico how to solve this problem. 5. What reasons has The Outlook for calling Enver Pasha a villain and for advocating that he be hanged? 6. Describe Turkish atrocities among the Armenians, Syrians, and Greeks. 7. Do you believe that Turkey should be entirely forced out of Europe? Reasons. 8. Explain the position taken by The Outlook in its editorial on "The Kaiser and the Law." Give your reasons for agreeing or disagreeing with The Outlook. 9. Three books well worth reading are "Mexico Under Carranza," by T. E. Gibbon (Doubleday, Page); "Mexico To-Day and To-Morrow," by E. D. Trowbridge (Macmillan); "Armenia a Martyr Nation," by M. C. Gobrielian (Revell).

II—NATIONAL AFFAIRS

A. Topic: Class Warfare by Bomb.

Reference: Page 224.

Questions:

1. Do the attempts on the lives of certain Americans described by The Outlook prove that there is here in America an Anarchist conspiracy of considerable extent and seriousness? Reasons. 2. In view of the facts and indications of a class warfare, name at least five things which, in your opinion, constitute the duty of public authorities of law and order. 3. Name and discuss duties of the common citizens as regards the activities and teachings of these assassins and their supporters. 4. Explain why the teaching that the way to liberty lies through class war is an insane dogma. 5. Discuss whether State and National authorities should abolish all I. W. W. and Bolshevik organizations, and deport promptly all men and women not American citizens whose utterances and acts show that they are in sympathy with such organizations. 6. Name fifteen ideals and teachings of true Americanism. 7. Books on the teachings of American democracy include the following: "Americanism: What It Is," by D. J. Hill (Appletons); "Bryce on American Democracy," edited by M. G. Fulton (Macmillan); "American Patriotism in Prose and Verse," edited by J. M. Gathany (Macmillan).

III—PROPOSITIONS FOR DISCUSSION

(These propositions are suggested directly or indirectly by the subject-matter of The Outlook, but not discussed in it.)

1. Economic interests should be subordinated to human interests. 2. A republican government is always on trial.

IV—VOCABULARY BUILDING

(All of the following words and expressions are found in The Outlook for June 11, 1919. Both before and after looking them up in the dictionary or elsewhere, give their meaning in your own words. The figures in parentheses refer to pages on which the words may be found.)

Opprobrium, contempt, bandit, thug (223); villain, scoundrel, irony (225); the academic mind, ingredient (228); plot, conspiracy, perpetrators, outrage, dogma (224).

If You Brush Teeth Brush Them Well

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

Don't Leave the Film

Millions of people who brush teeth daily leave a tooth-destroying film. They find in time that teeth discolor and decay. Tartar forms on them, perhaps pyorrhea starts. And they wonder why.

The reason lies in a film—a slimy, clinging film. You can feel it with your tongue. It gets into crevices, hardens and stays. There the tooth brush can't remove it, and the ordinary dentifrice cannot dissolve it.

That film is what discolors—not the teeth. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Dentists call it "bacterial plaque," because millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. Thus most tooth troubles are now traced to that film.

Dental science has for years sought a way to end that film. The tooth brush had proved inadequate. Tooth troubles constantly increased. And the reason clearly lay in that film.

A new discovery has now solved this greatest of tooth problems. That film can now be efficiently combated. Able authorities have proved the facts by scientific tests. Leading dentists all over America are now urging its adoption.

Now this method is embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And to let all people prove it quickly we are offering a free ten-day test.

See the Difference

Ask us for this trial tube, then see for yourself the difference between old methods and the new. It will be a revelation.

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to day by day combat it.

Pepsin alone is inert. It must be activated, and the usual method is an acid harmful to the teeth. So pepsin long seemed barred. But now a harmless activating method has been found. Five governments have already granted patents. It is that method, used in Pepsodent, which opens up this new teeth cleaning era.

Dentists and scientists are now using Pepsodent—many thousands of them. At least a million careful people have adopted it already. It is time that you knew what it means to you and what it means to yours.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Use it like any tooth paste. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the slimy film. See how the teeth whiten as the fixed film disappears.

Watch the results for ten days. Read the reasons in the book we send. Then decide for yourself about this new way of teeth cleaning.

Cut out the coupon now.

BROWNING AND THE KAISER

In considering the penalty to be inflicted on the ex-Kaiser, has any one noted the following quotation? Capoussachi speaks of Guido in Robert Browning's "Ring and the Book:"

Not death,—your lights will teach you clearer! . . .

Let us go away—leave Guido all alone
Back on the world again that knows him now!

I think he will be found (indulge so far!)
Not to die so much as slide out of life,
Pushed by the general horror and the common hate

Low, lower,—left o' the very ledge of things,

I seem to see him catch convulsively
One by one at all honest forms of life,
At reason, order, decency, and use—
To cramp him and get foothold by at least;
And still they disengage them from his clutch. . . .

And thus I see him slowly and surely edged
Off all the table-land whence life upsprings
Aspiring to be immortality,
As the snake, hatched on hilltop by mischance

Despite his wriggling, slips, slides, alidders down

Hillside—lies low and prostrate on the smooth

Level of the outer place, lapsed in the vale;
So I lose Guido in the loneliness,
Silence and dusk, till at the doleful end,
At the horizontal line, creation's verge,
From what just is to absolute nothingness—

THE FRIENDS OF OUR NATIVE LANDSCAPE

BY RAGNA B. ESKIL

If you are ever so fortunate as to be invited by the Friends of Our Native Landscape on one of their outing trips, go by all means, for they will let you enjoy yourself and nature as you please. If you want to go as the botanist does, with your eyes glued to the ground in search of new specimens, they will let you. If you want to carry the hammer of the geologist, they will let you. If, to the exclusion of every other sound or sight, you listen for the note of a certain bird, they will let you. Or if you want to hike for miles and miles, no one will stop you. But if you are like the most of the Friends, you will study only those birds and flowers and trees and stones that have a story to them, and, for the rest, you will let the spaciousness of the sky and the serene stretches of woods and hills and plains and lakes work their magic with you, and erase from your face the lines of fret and worry and from your souls the pettiness engendered by living too close to man-made things. You will feel your heart clutch at the wonder of a fringed gentian's heavenly blue against a brown background of withered brush, the altar stillness of a protected gully with the breeze swaying the trees at the top, the joy of a perfect leaf, the lesson of the

My 30 Day Approval Offer and Guarantee

Dr. Alsaker says: "Abnormal blood pressure (high or low) is caused by ignoring certain natural laws that keep us in health."

Dr. Alsaker has proved this fact for many years in his private practice.

In "Curing Diseases of Heart and Arteries" the Doctor explains in non-technical language a simple and pleasant way to remove the cause of heart troubles and hardened arteries—and there is no expense attached to this plan!

Those who follow "The Alsaker Way" always get relief; and 4 out of 5 cases are made safe for a long life. No detention from business. No sanitariums. No drugs. No special foods to buy or try.

I have such confidence in "The Alsaker Way" that I guarantee to refund your money if you follow the doctor's instructions for 30 days and are not delighted with your wonderful improvement. You are to be the judge.

The fact that I am permitted to advertise in The Outlook is a guarantee that I will carry out my part of this agreement. "The Alsaker Way" is advertised because it is the only way to bring this valuable knowledge to public attention.

Can the Danger from Apoplexy and High Blood Pressure be Lessened?

Inquiry No. 1835

Last week I had two severe shocks. One of my friends had a stroke of apoplexy and is now in a very serious condition; another one dropped dead. Both of them are a little past fifty, and both of them have suffered from high blood pressure for some time. I am anxious because I too am past fifty, and my blood pressure runs from 190 to over 200. From time to time I have discomfort in the region of the heart and pains in the head.

A third friend tells me that he followed your directions and recovered. He is active and looks healthy, but I can hardly believe this, for my physicians—and they are good ones—have informed me that high blood pressure can not be reduced. Please write me frankly by return mail. I want to linger here a while longer. F. R. M.

Answer—by R. L. Alsaker, M.D.

The condition mentioned in this letter is very common among men past the age of forty-five. This is a case of hardening of the arteries (arteriosclerosis) with high blood pressure. An examination nearly always shows more or less Bright's disease, and this is generally caused by the excessive pressure, which forces the albumin through the kidneys.

The pain in the region of the heart is due to the over-worked condition of the heart, which is often aggravated by gas in the stomach and the bowels. The pain in the head is caused partly by the excessive pressure of the blood, and partly by accumulations of waste in the body.

Nitro-glycerin Useless

Many physicians give nitro-glycerin to lower the excessive blood pressure, but this is useless, for though the pressure is temporarily reduced, it returns again.

The condition described is dangerous because if allowed to continue the patient will usually expire from apoplexy of the brain, or heart failure; sometimes death comes through Bright's disease, with its accompanying uremia.

Is the condition curable? It is in the majority of cases. Nearly everybody believes that hardened arteries with high blood pressure is a fatal affliction. And it is, if it is treated in the old way with drugs and a superabundance of food. If it is treated correctly, that is, in accordance with the laws of nature, at least four out of five will recover. Their arteries may not become quite as soft as they should be; their blood pressure may not return to the ideal point; but they will recover to such an extent that they have neither aches nor pains, nor are they in any further danger from apoplexy or heart disease. They will recover so completely that they can live to be old—far older than three score years and ten—and they can be so healthy that they don't feel anything wrong. And what more can they ask?

Blood Pressure Can be Reduced from 20 to 30 Points in One Month

In most of these cases correct treatment will reduce the blood pressure from twenty to thirty points the first month. After that the reduction is slower.

If this is true, why don't most doctors and many laymen know it? Because both physicians and lay individuals are looking for cures from pills, powders and potions, aided by serums and operations. And these means will not work in cases of high blood pressure.

The correct way, which is Nature's way, is so simple and reasonable that very few have discovered it to date. It consists of living so that the hardening process stops immediately, and then the blood pressure begins to decrease. Usually the patient is out of danger in a few weeks.

So if you would overcome high blood pressure and soften arteries that are too hard you will have to learn how to use your lungs to get plenty of fresh air; how to drink the right kind of liquids so as to aid in washing the impurities out of the body; how to eat the best of foods in the best way, so that these foods will build health instead of producing disease; and how to give the body good general care in every way.

4 Out of 5 Cases Can be Made Safe

There are exceptions who can not recover. This is because they have abused themselves so long that either the kidneys have failed beyond recovery, or the heart valves or heart walls have been too much injured, or the walls of the arteries themselves have become as brittle as chalk in spots. But the vast majority—at least four out of five on the average—can get into such good condition that they can truly say that they are enjoying good health.

I have had patrons who were continually dizzy; who had surging of the blood to the head; who had daily headaches; who had oppression in the region of the heart (precordial pain); who were so short of breath that they could not walk upstairs, nor could they walk as much as a block without resting—yes, individuals with as bad symptoms as that have recovered very good health after they had been told by competent physicians that nothing could be done for their hardened arteries and high blood pressure.

Nature performs wonders if you give her a chance. Permanent, dependable health is the result of correct knowledge put into practice. Given the right source of knowledge, the average man or woman can learn how to live in health in a very short time.

CICO paste is an international triumph of the Carter laboratories, made by an intricate process which is one of the most valuable secrets of the trade. There is no other paste like Cico—that sticks so well; that is always ready for use, that requires no water well, that spreads so thin and evenly—that is so generally well adapted for all uses in both office and home.

The Cico desk jar, illustrated above, is worthy of its calling. The brush is adjustable, reaching every corner of the container. The brush guard keeps the paste off the fingers and on the job, and serves to seal the jar when the screw cap is temporarily laid aside. The container intensifies three Cico qualities—economy, convenience, efficiency.

Make a memorandum to-day to try Cico. Sold by all stationers in the 5½ oz. size illustrated—also in jars from 1½ oz. (see below) to quarts.

slender alpine flower's survival of wind and weather, the glory of a massing storm. Then in the deepening nightfall, after the jolly meal about the camp-fire, you will gather again at the spot selected for the Council Fire—one of the few customs we have accepted from the Indian—and there in the big circle about the blazing light you will sing the songs of America that will make you love America more. Then you will hear a little talk from this and that person on the progress that is being made in America to save this and that worthy bit of primitive landscape for the generations yet unborn. And after a few more songs you will wend your way in a long single file back to the railway station that means the man-made city, and you will vow to yourself that the greatest gift you can bestow upon the city-weary is the possibility of a day such as this.

The Friends of Our Native Landscape spend three such outing trips each year—one in the hawthorn and wild crab-apple blossoming days, another in midsummer, and another when the autumn colors are at their best. The place of the meetings varies; the only condition is that the spot chosen must be in some area that is still "primeval America." But, since the headquarters of the society are in Chicago and the majority of the members are from the Middle West, it has so happened that the meetings have all been held in the Illinois-Indiana territory. Nevertheless its membership covers practically every State in the Union, and the scope of the organization is Nation-wide. Briefly, the reason for its being is to instill a greater appreciation of the native beauty of our landscape in every person whom it can reach; to get concerted action from school-children to assist in preserving the wild flowers and trees—the plea for this was in the shape of a school memorial sent out by the society to the school superintendents in the large cities; and to institute, further, and encourage every project that has for its object the saving of representative parts of primitive America for public park reservation.

To this end the Friends are urging now the creation of a National park out of the Dunes of Indiana; they rejoice at the keeping up of such natural parks as are in Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Boston, and Three Oaks, Michigan; they have helped lay out the plans for the forest preserves of Illinois; they joined the protest against the pasturing of sheep in the preserves of the Rocky Mountains. And last winter they started another activity—the holding of a National exhibit of paintings and etchings of native American landscape, at the Art Institute of Chicago. The exhibit proved such a revelation of the beauty of America's natural scenery and the sympathy of the American artists' delineation of it that the society is invited to hold this show biennially, and undoubtedly it will become a visiting exhibit in all the larger museums.

The society has been in existence for seven years. It was founded, and is still presided over, by Jens Jensen, the landscape architect, who perhaps has done more than any other one individual to release American landscape planning from the copyism of French and English ideas and to awaken America to a knowledge of the beauty of her natural topography and her indigenous trees and shrubbery and flowers.

LUMBER AS AN IMPORTANT FACTOR IN THE SOUTH'S PROSPERITY

BY J. E. RHODES

Secretary-Manager Southern Pine Association,
New Orleans, Louisiana

OF all lumber produced annually in the United States approximately twenty billion feet, or more than half, comes from Southern forests. Over 250,000 persons in 12,000 establishments are actively engaged daily in the manufacture of this material, the yearly output of which is valued at nearly $400,000,000, not including naval stores, chemicals, paper manufacture, and other by-product utilizations which have in themselves developed a commerce of great economic importance to this section. Indirectly, a population numbering fully 3,000,000 persons is dependent on the South's woods operations for a livelihood; in fact, lumbering is second only to agriculture in the South in the number of persons it employs, the capital investment represented (about $350,000,000), and wealth created.

It was little more than half a century ago that the increasing importance to the South of lumber began to be appreciated. While naval stores production is perhaps the oldest industry in America, lumbering proper was not undertaken on an extensive scale in the South until well after the Civil War, when the forests of the North began to become depleted and the need for new areas of standing timber caused the capitalist and the lumberjack to turn their thoughts toward the magnificent stands of pine, hardwood, and cypress which thickly covered the vast undeveloped territory extending through the States bordering the South Atlantic and Gulf coasts. Subsequent rapid development of the industry, especially during the last four decades, is strikingly set forth in the following comparative census returns, 1850-1910, the latest year for which Government figures are available, for the States of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, Missouri, and Texas:

THE SOUTHERN LUMBER INDUSTRY

Year.	No. of Establishments.	Capital Invested.	No. of Wage-Earners.	Wages.	Cost of Materials Used.	Value of Product.
1850.....	1,441	$4,883,213	6,605	$1,378,608	$2,446,178	$6,528,846
1860.....	2,147	10,613,795	11,193	3,017,924	5,879,415	15,172,835
1870.....	2,678	9,739,846	15,285	3,988,500	9,267,577	20,680,308
1880.....	3,138	14,289,964	17,648	3,578,372	15,461,640	25,003,128
1890.....	3,312	54,480,906	45,130	13,346,048	32,105,861	61,329,169
1900.....	7,090	129,169,948	76,303	22,773,205	66,046,685	121,919,485
1910.....	10,103	310,706,281	237,283	98,588,360	2,614,812	273,286,220

These figures do not include the important lumber-producing States of North and South Carolina and Virginia, the addition of which would contribute materially to the impressiveness of the showing.

While the number of lumbering operations apparently reached close to their zenith about 1910, other factors involved in the above compilation have increased from twenty per cent to fifty per cent, especially the items of wages paid and value of product.

In some of these States practically half the population is directly engaged in the production of forest products. Twenty billion feet of lumber is more than the whole United States furnished in 1880, and it is estimated that there is still enough uncut timber in the South to last twenty to thirty years.

The outlook for the lumber industry is, at the present time, particularly bright. With adequate and intelligent extension of credit by this country to the war-ridden people of Europe, an enormous demand will be made for forest products, sufficient to tax the capacities of the mills for a long period, without taking into consideration an unprecedented domestic demand. The normal annual imports of lumber by European countries, based upon figures for the year 1913, are 21,240,986,000 feet, of which the United States supplied 2,700,575,000 feet, or 12.7 per cent of the total. During the last four years exportation of lumber has been almost entirely cut off through lack of shipping facilities and suspension of building everywhere.

The consequent heavy arrears in lumber imports from these causes will have to be made good, besides the inestimable amounts required to rebuild the devastated areas. The export trade itself will prove a very sustaining element in the future of the lumber industry.

The demand for lumber for domestic needs will be no less pressing than that from foreign countries. According to Brookmire, reports from 105 cities of the United States indicate that from the beginning of the war in Europe in 1914 to the time our country engaged in it, April, 1917, the dammed-up demand for domestic construction amounted to $1,824,000,000, and since April, 1917, to $1,206,000,000, making a total of delayed construction in these 105 cities since August 1, 1914, of $3,030,000,000. This situation in the entire country, upon which we have no figures, will serve greatly to swell results.

In addition to the demands to take care of work in immediate prospect, the lumber manufacturers will be called upon to make heavy shipments to fill depleted stocks of the dealers. Recent figures show that present stocks of the dealers are seventy-five per cent of normal. Also the stocks now carried by the mills are much below normal. Figures for 147 representative Southern pine mills show that stocks at the present time are approximately forty-six per cent of the stocks on hand January 1, 1915.

I am convinced that the South will continue to enjoy prosperity, if for no other reason than that furnished by the sustaining element of the tremendous volume of business which is in sight for the lumber industry, both domestic and foreign. The productive capacity of Southern lumbering operations is enormous, and the Gulf States of America have the best and most readily available supply of lumber in the world, sufficient to take care of domestic needs and ship almost unlimited quantities abroad for a number of years. I think, therefore, that the South may reasonably expect the lumber industry to contribute materially to its increasing wealth and growing commercial greatness.

A SOLDIER'S IMPRESSION

A soldier-student who went through the Argonne and is now in the American School Detail at the University of Montpellier writes of a visit to an old abbey not far from there in a way that seems interestingly characteristic of the effect on our college men of the rather intimate contact with the rich traditions of the Midi:

My visit was to the Abbaye de Valmagne. Somehow I had a rather unthinking expectation of finding monks at prayer or preparing for the [Easter] feast. At first sight the abbey appeared half hidden in a grove of great wind pines and lilac bushes in the center of broad fields of budding vineyards. The day was perfect, the sky an unblemished blue, the air still, the sun at high noon. Everything seemed to say that it was the first day of the Provençal summer.

I rattled a wicket or two, rapped at a stable door and two others. There was no response. The buildings appeared as they might have appeared four hundred years back, but no living soul broke the spell of the hot noon. At last a man called to me from the upper story of the old dormitories. He pointed to a door and indicated a stairway by which I came soon into the small vaulted room where he and his old wife were having dinner. They were the caretakers. They invited me to eat and drink with them. Afterward the old man took down his huge keys and showed me willingly and silently—a great virtue in a guide—through every corner of the old abbey.

Two views among all the climbing towers and galleries were by far the most memorable. There was the cloister. The walls had ripened into an indescribable pink, a tint that puts all flesh coloring to shame. The tracery of the vault literally melted into the walls. This softening of color forbade shadow, or subtilized it beyond recognition. In the center of the central garden was a fountain, surrounded by columns united with a frieze and crowned with hollow tracery, that is, with the ribs only, of stone, like the pistils of a flower that bend together at their tips.

It is not necessary, I think, to say what the spirit of this deserted cloister was. It had not been deserted by its spirit. The cloister had gone on with that unconcern for time and change befitting the immortals, ripening and mellowing itself to the very core of the stone under the silent impress of the Provençal sun.

Then the old fellow took me into the abbey itself. There were twenty-one chapels in the aisles of the great abbey. The Lady-chapel had been left bare. In each of the others, lying in the cool shadow, was an immense vat of the Marquis's wine. No penitential procession had yesterday solemnized the Crucifixion, as for hundreds of years had been the unquestioning practice. No glad crowd of peasants and priests would celebrate to-morrow the feast of the Resurrection. Only the wine in great vats will be three days older and stronger and better to sell.

On one pillar of the north transept hung a heavy metal bell, discolored, blue and green. I touched it lightly with a finger nail, and the tone which it sent out, pure and low, into the farthest shadows of the spacious nave sounded like a note of magic to conjure up in beauty all the sadness of forgotten virtue and frailty, long buried, and a world outworn.

would have sealed the puncture instantly without the slightest loss of air. There would have been no delay—no danger—no dirty hard work—no weakening of the tire casing. For seven years and in forty different countries thousands of motorists have been enjoying the luxury of riding free from the worry and care of punctures, because their tires were KOR-KERIZED, and yet to many motorists the fact that KOR-KER absolutely seals punctures and stops slow leaks seems too good to be true.

KOR-KER is a rubber preservative. Preserves your tubes and casings. KOR-KER is not a tire filler—occupies but little space.

KOR-KER doubles life of inner tubes. Tubes can be changed from one casing to another. KOR-KER reduces blowouts to a minimum by keeping tires at normal inflation, whereby at least 90% of tire troubles are prevented.

Remember that KOR-KER preserves rubber.

This department will include descriptive notes, with or without brief comments, about books received by The Outlook. Many of the important books will have more extended and critical treatment later

FICTION

Blue-Grass and Broadway. By Maria Thompson Davies. The Century Company, New York.

A Kentucky girl comes to New York, becomes a writer of plays and sees the theatrical world in its joyous and dangerous aspects. The little romance is animated and amusing.

Lucky Mill (The). By Ioan Slavici. Translated from the Roumanian by A. Mircea Emperle. Duffield & Co., New York.

Oranges and Lemons. By Mary C. E. Wemyss. Houghton Mifflin Company, New York.

Yellow Lord (The). By Will Levington Comfort. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

A tale of an apparently languorous mid-Pacific island in which a miniature war arises out of the ill treatment by a greedy tea-growing company of its native workers, who are deliberately made slaves to opium, and so become mere industrial slaves also. Plot and incident are strange and exciting.

ESSAYS AND CRITICISM

Rousseau and Romanticism. By Irving Babbitt. Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston.

A close literary and philosophical study of romanticism in literature, not merely as it affected the French writers from Rousseau down, but as it afforded a new direction to imaginative writing in all modern belles-lettres.

HISTORY, POLITICAL ECONOMY, AND POLITICS
American Indian as Participant in the Civil War (The). By Annie Heloise Abel, Ph.D. (The Slaveholding Indians Series, Vol. II.) The Arthur H. Clark Company, Cleveland.

The part taken by the Indians in our Civil War, on both sides of the great conflict, is here set forth in great detail. It forms an interesting and hitherto almost entirely neglected chapter in the history of the war.

Conscientious Objector (The). By Walter Guest Kellogg. Introduction by Newton D. Baker. Boni & Liveright, New York.

Fighting the Spoilsman. By William Dudley Foulke, LL.D. G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

No student of current-day politics should be without this book. It describes the progress of Civil Service Reform from the early efforts for reform to the outbreak of the present war. In so doing it analyzes the Civil Service records of Presidents Cleveland, Harrison, McKinley, Roosevelt, Taft, and Wilson. Of these men the author declares that "Mr. Roosevelt was more consistent and energetic than any other President in advancing the reform." Mr. Foulke finds Mr. Wilson's first term "mainly reactionary" in this regard, but notes that his second term has been marked by at least one important Civil Service reform event, namely, the institution of competitive examinations for the position of postmaster of the first, second, and third class.

French Blood in America (The). By Lucian J. Fossick. Illustrated. Richard G. Badger, Boston.

In reading this volume one is astonished at the number of prominent Americans who have a strain of Huguenot blood. The list includes three Presidents—Tyler, Garfield, and Roosevelt; Paul Revere, Alexander Hamilton, John Jay, John C. Fremont, Henry D. Thoreau, John G. Whit-

Weigh what you Should

If thin, build up. If burdened with excess flesh, reduce! Have an attractive figure. You CAN—no sure as sunrise. Let me explain how 87,000 refined women have done this; how you can do it. Simple, sure, effective. All in your own room—in a surprisingly short time.

Be Well Without Drugs

I build your vitality so that all sorts of physical ailments are relieved by Nature's methods—no drugs nor medicines. I strengthen your heart, teach you how to stand, to walk and breathe correctly. I have spent 16 years at this work—leading physicians endorse me. My booklet telling how to stand and walk correctly is free. Shall I mail it to you NOW? If later you desire my services you will find the cost most reasonable. Write me.

tier, Admiral Dewey, and Thomas F. Bayard. The book tells of all these and many others in somewhat discursive style, with many entertaining anecdotes. As a history of Huguenot influence in this country it aims at being comprehensive.

Kino's Historical Memoir of Pimeria Alta. 1688-1711. By Herbert Eugene Bolton, Ph.D. Vols. I and II. (Spain in the West Series—Vols. III and IV.) The Arthur H. Clark Company, Cleveland.

Father Kino was one of the great Jesuit missionaries of early American history. He was notable as a man of action, an intrepid and indefatigable explorer, as well as an evangelist. This carefully edited work shows that he excelled also as a historian. His memoirs, here translated, furnish an invaluable commentary on the beginnings of the Southwest.

WAR BOOKS

Last Million (The). By Ian Hay. Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston.

Major Beith, British officer and author of "The First Hundred Thousand" and other virile and vivacious books about the war, here writes about "that born fighter and modern crusader, the American doughboy." He evidently has known our soldiers well, and he presents them as they are, with cordial friendliness.

National Governments and the World War. By Frederic A. Ogg and Charles A. Beard. The Macmillan Company, New York.

There are different kinds of democracy, and its chief exponents have latterly instituted notable changes in governmental organization and procedure. Our own Government, for example, in the Draft Act, the War Insurance system, in its Liberty Loans and tax laws, in the control of food, fuel, railway transportation, ship-building, express, telegraphs and telephones, in its Espionage Law, and in the many Federal agencies for war administration, has registered a high mark in the subjection of capital and labor, land and natural resources, to Governmental authority. We realize that even in peace time supervision of railways and of labor conditions cannot be left as much as before to the free course of private initiative. Thus the war has shown that a genuine democracy is quite compatible with a centralized government, and we now see that many powers evoked by war may also be exercised to the public good in the enterprises of peace.

World War and Leadership in a Democracy (The). By Richard T. Ely, Ph.D., LL.D. The Citizen's Library. The Macmillan Company, New York.

The author draws from his personal experiences in Germany to show what leadership in an autocracy has meant and how valuable expert leadership has been to the German Empire. He also shows us what leadership in a democracy means and how such leadership necessarily differs from that in an autocracy. He thus outlines the essential differences between Prussian and American ideals. With regard to the latter, we are glad to note, Dr. Ely does not fail to suggest improvements in our own form of government, especially as regards National defense. He is anxious that we shall have the advantage of universal military service, which has proved its worth in Switzerland, where it has existed for generations. He points out that such service, as a part of the education of all the people, does not mean militarism; that, on the other hand, such service strengthens a nation not only in defense, but also in intellectual and economic activities and as an agency of true progress.

BY THE WAY

Palisades Inter-State Park, at Bear Mountain, New York, is operated by a park commission, an unpaid body, which carries on the enterprises of the park without the aid of commercial concessionaires. It operates lunch stands and restaurants, provides omnibuses for visitors at cost rates, offers facilities for camping, and has a system of free rowboats by which any one who deposits twenty-five cents can have the use of a boat for half an hour's row on the Hudson, with his money back at the end of his trip.

The doughnut which opened the Salvation Army drive in New York City was cooked on an improvised stove on the steps of the Sub-Treasury Building by Commander Evangeline Booth. It was sold at auction, while still too hot to eat, for $5,000. This is probably the highest price ever paid for an edible dainty. During the Civil War a fifty-pound bag of flour was sold in a similar way for the Sanitary Commission for $150,000, or at the rate of $3,000 a pound.

What city has the best claim for the famous bronze horses that were taken down from St. Mark's at Venice during the war, to save them from destruction? Venice has had them for seven centuries, but before that Constantinople claimed them, and Athens, and Rome in the last days of the Empire. Now Rome has them again—they were sent to her for safe-keeping—and she doesn't want to give them up. Napoleon also coveted these splendid specimens of ancient art, and for a while they graced one of his triumphal arches in Paris.

People who like to do unusual "stunts" on the occasion of a wedding are now finding the performance of the ceremony in an airplane much to their taste. An event of this kind recently took place in Texas in which, a despatch states, a giant Handley-Page bombing plane carried up a wedding party of twelve persons, including both a plane pilot and a "sky pilot." The latter pronounced the happy couple man and wife at an elevation of 2,000 feet. From these heights of bliss, the despatch adds, the party descended safely to earth.

Mrs. Samantha Stanton Nellis, of Naples, New York, has the distinction, so a newspaper paragraph says, of being the oldest living member of the Methodist Church. She was born on June 1, 1810, and her one hundred and ninth birthday was celebrated with special services by the Methodists of Ontario County. Her life has spanned the century of missionary effort which is now being signaled by the Methodist denomination.

The "Conning Tower" credits this apology to the Deep River (Conn.) "New Era": "In this column last week the type made it read that J. Feinstein has just received a new line of narrow skirts. It should have read Arrow shirts. This correction is gladly made."

And this lapsus is credited to the "Scientific Monthly," the inference being that the dread epidemic has attacked even the printing-press: "The author of this article, distinguished for his explorations in tropical countries, died from influenza while it was passing through the press."

"The biggest saloon in the world," said a recent despatch to the New York "Sun," "which is located at Bridgeport, Ohio, will close its doors Monday night, May 26. It employs seventy-seven bartenders and clerks. For the past four years it has sold an average of twenty thousand drinks a day." The eminence of Bridgeport in this respect would thus seem to exceed that of Mexicali, just across the border in Lower California, which for several years claimed to have "the longest bar in the world." But why is Bridgeport thus distinguished?

John McCormack can tell stories as well as sing, it seems. Here is one of his after-dinner anecdotes: "Two Irishmen were at work when the whir of an airplane was heard. One of the men stopped work and gazed up at the machine. Then he said: 'Oid not loike to be up there in that thing, now.' Said the other, also gazing: 'Well, oid not loike to be up there mesilf without it.'"

A quick-witted Salvation Army man gathered in a tidy sum in New York City during the "drive" for thirteen millions. He asked two Salvation Army lassies to stand beside him on the platform and said: "Soldiers have been decorated in various ways, but there is only one way to decorate these girls." Thereupon, taking two one-dollar bills from his pocket, he pinned one upon each of his fellow-workers. The crowd proceeded to follow his example, and in a few minutes both girls were covered with greenbacks from head to foot. When their decorations were removed they totaled $287.

The "Journal of the American Medical Association" prints this skit under the head of "Business as Usual": "Peevish customer (to druggist)—'You gave me prussic acid by mistake for quinine this morning.' Druggist—'Is that so? Then you owe me fifty cents more.'"

A story told of the late Bishop Greer illustrates his unassuming character. On an occasion when he was to confirm a class, goes the story, a carriage was sent for him in charge of an English coachman who had been imported by a wealthy American. Bishop Greer walked unaccompanied and in non-clerical dress from his front door to the carriage and entered it—but the driver did not move his horses. After waiting for a moment the Bishop asked the man why he did not drive on. "I'm waiting for the Lord Bishop of New York, sir," he replied. "Well," said the Bishop, "I'm it. Drive on."

Boys have apparently been having their own way in some places during the war, but will have to submit to discipline again. An Irish paper's police court news contains this item in re a complaint brought against a boy for trespass:

The boy's father, O'Neill, said he had already given the boy a good "hiding" for trespassing on the mill premises, and promised that his son would not be found there again. The lad, he said, might have got a little out of hand during the four years that he was away in the army, but he could assure their worships that his son would not trespass on the mill premises again.

The same paper contains this extraordinary advertisement under the head "Thanksgiving:"

Thanksgiving to Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament, through the intercession of Our Lady, Help of the Sick, and glorious St. Roch, for the extermination of the foot-and-mouth disease in Ireland. Four Masses offered in 1912 and Mass once a year every year since.

For your Summer Outing— Go West

Summer Excursion Fares To National Parks and Resorts of the West

Here are lakes and streams, for fishing. Here you can climb snow-capped mountains, descend canyon trails, or bathe in the blue Pacific. Here, too, you can "rough it," off the beaten path.

Your outing in the West also may include glaciers and geysers—big trees and petrified forests—Indian pueblos and prehistoric ruins. Fine motor roads everywhere, and resort hotels.

Complete information, including illustrated booklets, may be obtained free. Ask your local ticket agent to help you plan your trip—or apply to the nearest Consolidated Ticket Office—or address the nearest Travel Bureau, advising what National Parks, or what section of the Rockies, the Pacific Coast, or the Northern Lakes you are interested in.

Pride of ownership is an instinct. It is as old as the human race itself and to it we owe much of the inspiration and incentive that have created our present highly civilized life.

Pride of ownership is a constructive influence. It fixes definite standards of living and encourages the production of all utilities that are worthy of respect and confidence.

Pride of ownership is both the cause and effect of Paige ownership. It is, indeed, the only adequate expression of the Paige idea.

THE SENATE AND THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

OPPPOSITION to the League of Nations on the part of Senators—at least, opposition to accepting the present Covenant of the League as a part of the Treaty of Peace—has become crystallized by what is known as the Knox Resolution, which we discuss editorially elsewhere in this issue. That resolution was drafted and presented by Senator Knox, who, as former Secretary of State, is acquainted with foreign affairs, and as former Attorney-General of the United States has a knowledge of the implications in the language of laws and treaties. His resolution has therefore commanded a certain respect even by those who have no respect for its purposes or object.

The Knox Resolution rehearses the fact that the United States declared war because a state of war had been thrust upon this country; declares that the Senate is concerned over the Treaty of Peace because its provisions appear to force upon us "undesirable and far-reaching covenants inimical to our free institutions, under the penalty that failing to accept these we shall continue in a state of war;" states that the people of the United States have not had time to examine and consider the proposed League of Nations or to express a mature judgment upon it; declares that the Treaty may be so drawn as to leave the question of the League of Nations for later determination; and also expresses the opinion that there are guarantees and undertakings in the Treaty that obliterate legitimate aspirations, oppress weak nations, and destroy progress and liberty. The Resolution therefore would commit the Senate to opposing all treaty provisions going beyond the ends for which the United States entered the war; to declaring it beyond the authority of the treaty-making power to make any treaty which in effect amends the Constitution; to advising that the Treaty be drawn so as to permit any nation to reserve the question of the League of Nations for separate consideration, but so as to provide that such separate consideration shall not affect the obligations of Germany, and also advising that any participation of the United States in the League before it becomes a member should be through diplomatic commissions; and to notifying those who have drawn the Treaty that modification of the draft of the Treaty to comply with these resolutions would facilitate the early acceptance of the Treaty by the Senate, would in no wise interfere with the League of Nations as between those countries that are ready to ratify the Treaty without further consideration, and would be expressive of the real friendship between ourselves and our co-belligerents.

Opposition to this Resolution has developed in the Senate principally on the part of Democratic Senators. They do not wish to have it even reach a vote. They believe that if one-third of the Senate vote for this resolution it would be a virtual notification to the President that the Senate would not ratify the Treaty, because it requires two-thirds of the Senate to secure ratification. On the other hand, those who oppose the Treaty believe that it would be better for the President and for the whole Peace Conference to know in advance that the Treaty cannot be ratified, if it cannot be, and that they ought not to be deprived of that knowledge when they might have it. The Democrats, on the other hand, apparently take the view that if it remains unsettled whether the Treaty will be ratified or not until the President comes home, the country will rally to the support of the President and force a ratification.

The real question, therefore, last week was the question of bringing about a record vote in the Senate on this resolution, and that called for skillful parliamentary tactics.

The controversy over the Knox resolution has practically thrown into oblivion the outcome of the discussion about the so-called "leak" by which the text of the Peace Treaty became known. It turned out that it was former Senator Root who had the copy of the Treaty which Senator Lodge saw, and that this copy had been brought to this country perfectly legitimately by Mr. Davison, the Chairman of the League of Red Cross Societies, and as such legitimately concerned in the Treaty's provisions. The result of the investigation seemed to satisfy everybody.

AMERICAN TROOPS AGAIN IN MEXICO

For the third time under the present Administration it has seemed necessary to throw American troops in some force into Mexico. It is more than two years since General Pershing's expeditionary force sent into Mexico with the avowed object of running down Villa was withdrawn, that object not having been accomplished. It is over five years since American troops entered Vera Cruz with the avowed object of compelling Huerta to salute our flag in acknowledgment of insults to this country. In not one of the three incursions into Mexico has there been any purpose of grasping the fundamental question of permanent security to Americans and American interests in Mexico and the bringing about of settled and orderly conditions in Mexico itself.

The same Villa who was held responsible for the attack upon Columbus is still conducting raids and developing revolutions in Mexico. What stronger evidence could there be of the inefficiency of the Carranza Government than the fact that this brigand on a large scale is able two years after the affair at Columbus to attack and temporarily occupy the important town of Juarez, just across the bridge from the American city of El Paso? Surely a Mexican Government which has been in power for two years should have force enough behind it to protect such a dangerous and critical point as this. But with full knowledge that the United States has a declared policy of crossing the border and driving back any force whose shots are falling in American territory and killing, wounding, or seriously endangering American citizens, the Mexican Government has failed to guard this vital spot.

Just how much injury was done to American citizens by Villa's warfare in and about Juarez is not quite clear as we write, but it is reported that several persons were wounded and perhaps one or more killed. At all events, Brigadier-General Erwin, in command of American troops in the vicinity, immediately threw thirty-six hundred soldiers—cavalry, light artillery, and infantry—into Mexico. The war was a short one. Villa's forces were soon put to retreat. Our losses are reported as one killed and five or six wounded. Villa's losses were much larger than this, precisely how great is not positively known; one report says that fifty of his men were killed. The object in driving back the forces which were endangering American territory having been accomplished, our little army was withdrawn as rapidly as it was advanced. Major-General Cabell, Commander of the Southern Department, was quick to comply with the request of the Mexican Federal authorities—that is, with President Carranza's officers. It was made clear to Carranza that there was no intention to violate Mexican sovereignty. Our State Department was prompt to disclaim the existence of a state of war, and pointed out that in several minor cases previously it had been necessary for American forces "very briefly to cross the border to disperse bandit forces."

This sensational incident is only one more proof that it is folly to indulge in optimism as to the future of Mexico so long as it does not have a Government with will and power to maintain order. Not alone American lives and property on the border, but American lives and property within Mexico, must be protected, for it is still evident that we cannot call upon the Government of Mexico, as we could upon the Government of Canada, to punish injury to our citizens and to uphold our rights. So long as our authorities deal with the symptoms and not with the causes of unrest in Mexico we shall have trouble and probably a recurrence of such incidents as the three "little wars" that have marked this Administration's treatment of the problem.

A RUSSIAN POLICY AT LAST?

Ever since the beginning of the Russian Revolution America's policy toward Russia has been negative. Last week, however, brought a change. The chief men at the Peace Conference (including President Wilson) notified Admiral Kolchak and his associates who are in control of the Omsk Government in Siberia that they are ready to assist them with munitions, supplies, and food to establish them as the Government of All Russia.

The Allies, including America, have done this as a consequence of the reply which Kolchak has made to their inquiry. On May 26 the Council of Five (Clemenceau, Lloyd George, Orlando, Wilson, and Saionji) inquired whether Kolchak would agree to summon a Constituent Assembly, permit free elections, refuse to countenance special privileges for any class or order in Russia, recognize the independence of Finland and Poland, settle the question of other Russian territories if need be through the League of Nations, recognize the right of the Peace Conference to determine the future of the Rumanian part of Bessarabia, agree that Russia should join the League of Nations, and abide by Kolchak's former declaration about Russia's national debt.

Kolchak's reply to this was evidently satisfactory. It is understood that he would not agree to the reconvening of the old Constituent Assembly because circumstances had made that unrepresentative, and as to Finland and certain other frontier questions he said that they should be left to the Constituent Assembly.

The American policy toward Russia has been so vague and vacillating that it will be a long time, we fear, before Russians can bring themselves to consider America dependable. Our Government flirted with the Bolsheviki while the Bolsheviki were imposing upon the Russian people a state of terrorism worse than anything that existed under the Czar; and now it joins in recognizing the Bolsheviki's adversary. We welcome the change. There is no one, so far as we know, who regards Kolchak as perfect, or considers his government anything more than a provisional government constituted to restore the basis of order and law. Those who fear the restoration of Czarism might as well fear the restoration of the stage-coach to take the place of the railway. No man can turn time back again. There is, however, a possibility that Russia may come under what we would call reactionary government. That, however, is made more likely the longer there prevails the sort of anarchism, combined with dictatorship, that characterizes the Bolshevik movement.

The only hope for Russia lies in a government which can command the support of such widely varying elements as are represented by the ex-official Sazonov, the moderate Lvoff, and the Socialist Tchaykovsky. The government that has this support is the Omsk Government. It is to the credit of Kolchak that he expressed no resentment at the interference in Russia's internal affairs implied in the inquiry of the Council of Five, that he declined to make promises which he could not fulfill, and that he left to Russia's Constituent Assembly decisions concerning the Constitution of Russia which the Council of Five asked him to make.

THE SWIFT FLIGHT FROM AMERICA TO IRELAND

Until last week the record time for a continuous passage across the Atlantic (the Mauretania's) was about four and a half days; now it is about sixteen hours. The airship has left the steamship far behind. One had hardly read in his paper that the marvelous feat was under way when it was actually accomplished. In all but a straight line Captain John Alcock and Lieutenant Arthur W. Brown (the latter, it is pleasant to note, of American parentage) flew at the average speed of 120 miles (geographical) an hour from St. John's, Newfoundland, to Clifden, in County Galway, Ireland, 1,932 geographical miles, in sixteen hours and twelve minutes. They literally, we are told, lunched one day on one side the ocean and breakfasted the next day on the other side. They had strong favoring northwest and southwest winds behind them; but, on the other hand, they were troubled with fogs, and air navigation when no horizon is visible, and when it is almost impossible to get observations from sun, moon, or star, is a hazardous science. How they did it and how they kept from dropping into the sea in their efforts to get down out of the fog strata is incomprehensible to the non-aviator. The two engines seem to have functioned perfectly, and a bad landing in an Irish bog was the only serious mishap. The great Vickers-Vimy biplane was a more stormworthy vehicle than Hawker's single-engined plane. Experts, including Alcock himself, believe that the future of ocean air navigation lies with some form of sea-air boat.

The intrepid airmen have received the greetings of rival airmen, of the King, of the American Navy fliers, and of all who are thrilled by courage and determination. The romance and narrow escape of Hawker naturally aroused unique enthusiasm and excitement; with Alcock and Brown admiration is pretty evenly divided between the men and the feat. America's first transatlantic crossing and England's first non-stop, swift flight will always be memorable events marking advance along the road of aerial progress.

THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR

The sessions of the annual Convention, at Atlantic City, of the American Federation of Labor, which has a membership of over three millions, are still going on as we write, and the final declarations still remain to be formulated. But several interesting indications show the trend and present feeling of the Convention.

One such indication is the determination to break down the color barrier in the Federation and to admit Negro workers to the privileges of its unions. This is not only a recognition of the fact that industrious and ambitious colored men are to be judged industrially upon their merits and not upon their race, but it indicates a growing interest in the Federation as to social advance. So also does the earnest recommendation by a special committee to the Federation that it should urge trade-unionists to seek representation on boards of education and should help in Americanization by adult education and night classes.

The Federation is, and has been through the war, strongly patriotic. Its Executive Council, in commending to the Convention the League of Nations, puts its reason for doing so on the ground that "it places human relations upon a new basis and endeavors to enthrone right and justice instead of strength and might as the arbiter of international destinies."

The same feeling was expressed in President Gompers's opening address, when he said: "The war has brought into play new thoughts of the rights of man, has brought into play and developed the thought that the relations between nation and nation must be better than they have ever been in the history of the world."

One of the most interesting features of the Convention has been the address by Secretary Wilson, of the Department of Labor. Among his declarations most applauded was that "American labor would never take seriously to Bolshevism and that it would never reach more serious proportions than local disturbances. Our wage-earners are not going to stand for any system that will lower their standards of living. They are not going to listen to Bolshevism."

Secretary Wilson opposed the formation of a Labor party and analyzed the difference as to this policy between labor in this country and in Great Britain. He spoke moderately and sensibly about the proposal to enter into a strike demonstration because of the Mooney case, telling his hearers that the Labor Department was still bringing efforts to bear for a satisfactory termination of the matter, pointing out that the judge and jury in the Mooney case are not charged with unfairness and that such a demonstration proposed would be an attack on our jury system, and adding that in his own investigation, at the President's request, it appeared that the real trouble was that "witnesses had not been honest in their testimony and new evidence has been secured that warrants a new trial."

The Federation of Labor represents the more conservative element in industrial questions, for its members are largely skilled and well-paid workers. There are radicals among them, but even they are not likely to give any countenance to the doctrines of "Reds," Anarchists, or Bolsheviks.

DRUG ADDICTS IN AMERICA

Some astonishing statistics as regards the use of narcotic drugs in this country have just been published by the Bureau of Internal Revenue. Indeed, they are so surprising that one feels that possibly they should be accompanied with a little more complete explanation than that given. The statement is in the form of a report of a committee appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury a little over a year ago. Congressman H. T. Rainey is its chairman and the Committee includes a professor of pharmacology at Harvard, a representative of the United States Public Service, and a former deputy commissioner of the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

Among the statements made in this report are that opium and other narcotic drugs are used by probably about a million people; that the "underground" traffic in narcotic drugs is about equal to the legitimate traffic; that the so-called "dope peddlers" appear to have a National organization for their nefarious trade, obtaining the drugs by smuggling over our borders or at the coast ports; and that three-fourths of the cocaine consumed in this country is for illicit purposes.

The investigation carried on by the Committee led to the conclusion that the wrongful use of narcotic drugs has materially increased in certain sections. Thus twenty cities, the aggregate population of which is ten million people, report an increase. New York City and San Francisco are among the number. The Committee regrets that there has been no definite or concerted action by State and municipal governments to suppress the traffic, and evidently believes that such combined effort would both increase our knowledge of the subject and make it possible to deal with it effectively. The causes brought out in the investigation for addiction to drugs, stated in the order of their frequency, are: Use of physicians' prescriptions, association with other addicts, prohibition, use of drugs for chronic diseases, curiosity to learn the effect of the drug, use of patent or proprietary medicines, use of drugs as a stimulant, idleness, and use by dentists.

A singular result of the investigation was the discovery that of eighteen hundred peddlers of drugs, the occupations of the peddlers were said by the police to be, in the order of the numbers in each class: Gamblers, taxicab drivers, domestics, solicitors, messengers, vagrants, lunch-room helpers, pool-room employees, porters, laundrymen.

One of the incidental questions discussed by this report is the effect of prohibition laws on the use of habit-forming drugs. The majority of replies to the inquiries sent out seem to express the belief that the immediate effect of prohibition would be to increase the use of narcotic drugs. But this belief, we judge from the report, is rather one formed from theory and on the general idea that some substitute will be sought than on thorough investigation or statistical information as regards the States in which prohibition has been in effect.

These facts and figures speak for themselves, even allowing for the lack of absolutely complete information and perhaps some lack of thorough knowledge as to the proportion of legitimate and illegitimate use. There would seem to be no question that National and State investigation and legislation, and the more rigid enforcement of existing laws, are seriously needed.

SENATOR SPOONER'S DEATH

John C. Spooner, for sixteen years one of the representatives of the State of Wisconsin in the United States Senate, died on June 11 at the age of seventy-six. He came of one of the oldest of New England families, the founder of which landed in America at Plymouth in 1637. In purpose and effort Senator Spooner was also thoroughly American; essentially a party leader, he had nevertheless strong personal convictions, and when his attitude toward legislation differed from that of his party or of the people at large even his opponents recognized the fact that he was sincere and honorable in his convictions and that he had essentially the character of a statesman as distinguished from that of a politician.

Senator Spooner's early training was that of a lawyer, and his public career was always influenced by the fact that he was a great jurist and a profound student of constitutional and international law. When it came to propounding the legal principles involved in any proposed legislation, the Senate and the country always listened with respect and confidence in his exposition and argument. Throughout all his political career he was a Republican leader. He was often the authoritative and final spokesman for his party in large matters of legislation. That his ideas and theories were capable of change and evolution was seen in his attitude toward the duty and responsibility of the country outside its own borders. A remark often quoted is that "Spooner endured the annexation of Hawaii, pitied the taking over of the Philippines, and embraced the seizure of the Panama Canal."

Naturally, Senator Spooner was conservative in temperament, and it is probable that his work in Congress was more valuable in opposing innovations in public policy and in fighting extravagance than in constructing measures for important new action or policy. A long list might be made of things which he opposed, such as ship subsidies and the attaching of "riders" to general legislation. Personally he was a man of great dignity, and a forceful speaker, and he was possessed of intellectual strength far above that of the average member of the upper house.

MAKING CHAMBER MUSIC ACCESSIBLE

A considerable amount of chamber music of excellent quality has been produced in recent years by those of our composers who are interested in this least salable type of music, and now quietly reposes in their portfolios. Human motives are mixed; but he who composes a sonata for violin and piano or a quartette for strings must presumably act primarily from a love of art. If he wanted fame, he would prefer some more sensational medium, such as the orchestra or opera; if he wanted popularity or money, he would choose songs and piano music, for which there are thousands of potential performers and purchasers. But how many hundreds in our vast population can play sonatas and quartettes, or have the refinement of taste to love as it deserves to be loved this most intimate and purest type of the divine art? And what chance could there be, with so small a public interested, for a composer to get such works printed by publishers whose livelihood depends on the wide sale of their publications? It is easy to see, then, that the composer of chamber music must write for love, if he write at all. M. Saint-Saëns, in describing conditions in France before the foundation of the Société Nationale de Musique, says that "before 1870 one had truly to be bereft of all common sense to write music."

If it be true, as no less a critic than M. Romain Rolland, author of "Jean Christophe," believes, that the Société Nationale has been "the cradle and the sanctuary of French art," we may hope that an inestimable service to our own musical art may be achieved by a newly formed Society for the Publication of American Music. This Society, of which Mr. John Alden Carpenter is president, and which numbers among its founders some of our musicians of highest standing, announces that its aim is not "to fondle American composers who need a stimulus to composition," nor "to make access to the public easy for music that is technically crude, barren of inspiration, and forgetful of artistic ideals," nor yet "to exercise undue pressure on artists and organizations to perform music by American composers merely because they happen to be American composers." In other words, the Society is not chauvinistic. Its aim is simply "to widen and deepen interest in the larger forms of good concert music by American composers" by publishing each year two or three chamber music works selected by judges of discrimination, supplying them to the subscribers at a subscription fee of five dollars a year, and thus making them available to chamber music groups both in America and in Europe.

In thus confining itself to the single function of publication the Society saves itself from some of the pitfalls into which such attempts often fall. Its circular says with truth that the self-respecting American composer does not want "patriotic charity," but simply "a square deal based on the intrinsic art value of his work." Its aim is to secure for chamber music, by the organization of its scattered devotees, access to such a public sifting of merit as may test, prove, and establish intrinsic merit, wherever it may exist.

Those interested to co-operate in so hopeful an undertaking may obtain the circulars of the Society by applying to its secretary, Mr. William Burnet Tuthill, 185 Madison Avenue, New York City, Room 1608.

NO MORE TITLES IN CANADA

Knighthoods, baronetcies, and peerages are no longer to be bestowed on Canadians. In spite of the opposition of several of the most influential members of the Government and the known disapproval of Premier Borden, who had not then returned from the Peace Conference, the Canadian House of Commons passed not long ago by a strong majority a resolution requesting that royal honors of this sort be conferred no more on Canadians resident in Canada. When the present generation of titled Canadians passes away, knighthoods, baronetcies, and peerages will be known no more in Canada. Hereditary titles are to be extinguished with the death of those now bearing them.

Titles have been conferred in Canada in the past at the suggestion either of the Canadian Government itself, or of the Governor-General acting on his own initiative, or of the British Government. As a usual thing, they have been given only to men who have served the public interest in some noteworthy manner. Nominally a mark of royal favor, titles have actually been given and considered as a graceful recognition by the state of public-spirited service. It is in that light that they have been regarded by the recipients and by the general public. Although most Canadians probably regarded them as something of an anomaly on this continent, there was, until recently, little opposition to any but hereditary titles from even the most ardent democrats. Very few hereditary titles have ever been conferred on Canadians, because of the sentiment in Canada against anything that might serve to create an hereditary aristocracy.

In recent years, however, the King's honors have been bestowed with a lavish hand, and not all of the selections have met with popular approval in Canada, with the result that public sentiment became aroused against all titles. Early in 1918 the Canadian Government sent a request to London that titles should be conferred on Canadians only on the recommendation of the Cabinet at Ottawa, and since that date Canadians have been conspicuously absent from the honor lists.

Probably the action of the Canadian Parliament in this matter is not of great importance. Canadian knights, as a rule, have been just as democratic as their untitled neighbors. Nevertheless it indicates a solidarity and similarity of sentiment on questions of this kind in the two kindred democracies of the North American continent. The Canadian and American points of view are much the same on most questions.

THE TELEGRAPHERS' STRIKE

A hopeful aspect of the strike of the telegraph operators appeared last week when the strikers learned, as they supposed, that an order issued by Postmaster-General Burleson insured their unions the privilege of collective bargaining. Later it was discovered that the order applied in words only to telephone operators and that the telegraph was not named. There seems to be no reason why the privilege should not be accorded to both classes. The telegraphers' union has presented a statement to the Post Office Committee of the lower house in Congress in which they demand the right to bargain collectively and say that "Mr. Burleson has used his personal and official influence to prevent an adjustment of differences between the workers and their employers."

The Government still controls the wires, but does not operate them; it is asked to see that the employees have the same right to act through unions as have the railway employees.

DR. MOTON ON THE NEGRO SOLDIER

At the request of the President and the Secretary of War, Dr. Robert R. Moton, the successor to Booker Washington as Principal of Tuskegee Institute, visited France with a view to obtaining information about the conduct of the Negro as a soldier and morally. Rumor, or what Dr. Moton calls the "whispering gallery," had produced a rather widespread opinion that in both respects there was serious reason to believe that in some units, and particularly in one division, the record was bad actually and as compared with white troops.

Loose generalization is the favorite weapon of scandal. Dr. Moton made careful inquiry from officers and soldiers at General Headquarters, divisional headquarters, from press correspondents, and from French people. He states what he found to be the facts in an article in the "Southern Workmen." As to the allegation concerning sexual crimes by Negroes, he was told at General Headquarters that the crime was no more prevalent among colored soldiers than among white soldiers, that the number of cases charged was small, and the number of convictions by court martial much smaller—only three, for instance, in the division which had been designated by rumor as the worst unit.

The charges of the failure of colored soldiers as fighting men Dr. Moton found to be equally exaggerated. He says: "There was apparently no doubt in the mind of anybody in France, so far as I was able to find out, among the French or Americans, as to the qualities of the American Negro as a soldier when led by white officers." Dr. Moton did, however, find a pretty strong feeling that Negro officers had been a failure. In one division, as to which failure on a large scale had been charged, Dr. Moton found that "a small portion of a single battalion of a single regiment had failed," and that about a dozen Negro officers of this battalion had been tried. The commanding officer at Le Mans, commenting to Dr. Moton on the fact that fifteen Negro officers had been found inefficient, said to Dr. Moton: "We sent back to America, in six months, an average of one thousand white officers a month who failed in one way or another in this awful struggle. I hope, Dr. Moton," he added, "that you won't lose your faith in my race because of that, and certainly I am not going to lose my faith in your race because of the record of a few colored officers who failed."

In short, Dr. Moton, while he found failures and imperfections, learned nothing to substantiate the generalized rumors of a failure of his race in any large sense. On the contrary, he believes that officers and men made a fine record, and that there were a remarkable number of cases of heroic action, recognized by French and American awards. They went, he says, into battle "with dash, courage, and an absolutely unshaken and undisturbed morale."

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS IN THE SENATE

THE United States Senate has now under consideration a resolution known, from its author, as the Knox Resolution, which, if adopted, would result in the rejection of the present Treaty of Peace embodying the League of Nations, but indicates the acceptance of that Treaty if the League of Nations is left for future consideration. This policy of separation is also urged by our former Ambassador to Germany, Dr. David Jayne Hill, in an article in the "North American Review" for June, in which he says of the Senate, "It can ratify a treaty of peace and at the same time reject a compact for a League of Nations." This policy he supports by the statement that "the Signatory Powers could not consistently refuse to separate what they had themselves intended not to join together until the President forced them to do so; for they were prepared to postpone the League of Nations and sign a preliminary treaty of peace, when the President returned to Paris from his visit to America and changed their plans." This statement of fact is confirmed, from his own knowledge, by our editorial representative who was in Paris during the President's absence in this country.

We agree with Dr. Hill that "the Senate has the Constitutional right to withhold its consent from a treaty of which it does not approve. It may withhold it completely or in part." Moreover, if a sufficient number of Senators are resolved to defeat the Treaty of Peace with the League of Nations incorporated in it, they do well to notify the Peace Council at this time in order that the Council may separate the League from the Treaty and add to the Treaty such provisions for continuing the present alliance as may be necessary to secure the execution of the Treaty of Peace by Germany.

We hope, however, that the League of Nations will be adopted by the Senate of the United States. We believe that this is the hope of the great majority of the American people. And the sooner the decision is made and the League of Nations organized, the better for the reputation of America and for the safety and peace of the world. In this great world movement America should be a leader, not a follower.

A party of campers, following a blind trail in the woods, comes to a point where it divides, and the campers stop to discuss whether they shall take the left-hand or the right-hand fork. No one in the party knows where either fork will lead them. They can only discuss probabilities. Such is the present situation of the United States.

The possibility of a League of Nations has been under discussion in this country for nearly a quarter of a century. The wisdom of what is substantially the present plan has been under discussion for several months. Objections and advantages have been weighed in the balance. Amendments have been proposed, some accepted, some rejected. Longer delays are dangerous, possibly may be disastrous, not merely to the League but to the American people and to the world. It is extremely desirable that the American people reach a conclusion and turn their attention from foreign affairs which are important but in their consequences to us remote, and give their attention to domestic problems which are no less important and in their consequences to us imminent.

We who believe in the League of Nations must recognize the fact that it is an experiment. If we adopt it, we enter upon a new world policy; if it does not mean a limitation on our National sovereignty, it does impose on our Nation new obligations which future Congresses will be morally bound to fulfill; and it involves a frank abandonment of national isolation and a frank adoption of international co-operation.

We must recognize that there is reason why many Americans are more slow to adopt the conclusions of the Peace Congress than are the English, French, or Italian people. Lloyd George, Clemenceau, and Orlando have each been given within the last year a new power of attorney by their respective peoples to act for them. Mr. Wilson has asked for such a power of attorney from the American people and they have refused it. He asked them last fall to elect a Democratic Congress and told them that their refusal would be equivalent to a vote of want of confidence in his Administration, and in the face of that statement they elected a Republican House and a Republican Senate. Certainly the majority of both Senate and House and probably the majority of the American people have not been represented at the Peace Congress. True, the President appointed a Republican of admirable character, proved ability, and diplomatic experience, but he was not the choice of the Republican party. The President is within his Constitutional rights in negotiating this Treaty without previous consultation with the Senate; but the Senate would be equally within its Constitutional rights if it should notify the European Powers that the result of the President's negotiations has not been satisfactory to the American people and will not be ratified unless it is amended.

Nevertheless we hope to see the League of Nations adopted by the Senate, and we think that the delays in that adoption which the Knox Resolution, if passed, would involve would outweigh any advantage which may be hoped for from further debate or future amendments.

It is true that the League of Nations is a new adventure in our National policy; but the Americans are an adventurous people. The discovery of America was an adventure. The Declaration of Independence was a perilous adventure. The formation of the Constitution was an entirely new adventure in national organization. The Louisiana Purchase and the extension of our Republic from ocean to ocean was an adventure from which cautious men would have dissuaded us. Our whole history has been one succession of adventures, and it does not teach us to be afraid of adventurous experiments.

It is true that the League of Nations implies the assumption of new obligations by the United States. It recognizes the fact that the policy of National isolation tion is past and a policy of international co-operation is substituted. But in so doing it simply recognizes a fact that exists and carries forward a policy which has already been begun. The steamship has put Liverpool within five days of New York, and an airplane has reduced the transatlantic voyage to less than one day. Our Monroe Doctrine, our Panama Canal, our National Copyright Law, our international postal laws, our deliverance of Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines from a seventeenth-century despotism, and our alliance with England, France, and Italy in preserving the civilization of the twentieth century from the barbarism of the Hun, have been successive steps toward international co-operation and have imposed upon us international obligations unknown to us in our National isolation.

It is true that the Republican party and at least one-half of the American people have had no official representation in the negotiations which have been carried on at Paris. But unofficially they have been represented. If the Republicans could have selected a statesman to represent them, their choice would probably have been Mr. Root, Mr. Hughes, Mr. Taft, or Mr. Lodge. These four representative Americans have all offered amendments and their amendments have reached the Peace Council, and, while not all the amendments of any one of these eminent statesmen have been adopted, it is said that all the amendments on which all of them agreed have been incorporated in the League in its final form.

The objections to the League of Nations which we have endeavored fairly though briefly to state are serious. We do not ignore or belittle them. But there are more serious objections to entering upon the next epoch in the world's history without a League.

So long as there are robbers in the country there must be armed police to resist them; so long as there are robber nations in the world there must be armies to resist them. But there ought to be some better way than war to settle those disputes which are always liable to arise between civilized peoples. Men of justice and peace must repel with force attempted crime; but men of justice and peace need not resort to force to settle controversies between themselves. When Germany attempts to assassinate Belgium and France and Turkey attempts to assassinate Armenia, the civilized nations ought to come to the defense of the defenseless. But when a dispute arises between civilized nations about the question whether Fiume shall be an Italian or Croatian port, or whether Dantsic shall be a Polish or a German port, some more civilized method than war should be discoverable for settling it. The League of Nations is an attempt to find a solution for these two problems: "How can civilized nations settle peaceably their controversies?" and "How can they combine to protect each other from robber nations?"

And the League of Nations is the only plan now proposed for that purpose. Individuals may have better plans to offer, but the present League is the only one officially recommended to the civilized Powers. The alternative is a return to the perpetual apprehension of possible war, competitive armament in preparation for war, and extemporized alliances to meet robber nations whenever one of them issues his challenge to the world, or else selfish inaction while defenseless people are plundered as were the Cubans or murdered as were the Armenians. The remote perils feared by the opponents of the League of Nations seem to us far less than the inevitable perils involved in a return to the old policy of National isolation.

These perils were never so imminent as they are to-day. Three great imperial governments have been destroyed—Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Russia. What the future governments of these countries will be no man knows, though it is almost certain that the old governments will not be restored. Three new nations have been created or are in the process of creation—Jugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, and Poland. The old authority in central and eastern Europe has gone, and no new authority has yet arisen to take its place. An unscrupulous minority are eager to establish a new class rule for the old class rule. They are ready to toss into the scrap-heap the claims of their fellow-men to the inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. If there ever was a time when a free people should welcome the co-operation of other free peoples in the resolve that "government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth," that time is now. While we debate the mob robs, burns, murders, and rapes. It is time for action, time for a combination of all civilized nations in a common purpose which they might well define in these words taken from our own Constitution: "In order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and posterity."

Democracy is more than a form of government; it is a spirit of life. It is regard for each other's rights, respect for each other's opinions, interest in each other's interests. Not because in this country we have a President instead of a King, a Congress instead of a Parliament, and States instead of Provinces, but because in the hearts of the American people there is something of this spirit of humanity, we men and women gathered out of all nations and tribes and peoples and tongues are able to live together in peace and good will. Is there enough of this spirit of humanity in the world to make a democracy of nations possible? We believe that there is at least enough to make the experiment worth trying.

In building we lay the foundation first and erect the superstructure afterward. But in growing we plant a seed and it thrusts down the roots and at the same time pushes up the stem and the branches. The spirit of brotherhood has made the Union of States possible; but also the Union of States has created the spirit of brotherhood. The League of Nations is a seed. We believe that there is enough of the spirit of brotherhood in the world to plant the League and see to what it may grow.

THE DAYLIGHT SAVING RIDER

A "RIDER" is a device used by legislators in order to enact a measure which they are unwilling to have debated and passed on its merits or rejected. If they prepare such a measure as a separate bill and put it to a vote, those who oppose it will be able to vote against it. What they do is to attach it to some appropriation bill or other bill of overwhelming importance. Then those who oppose the attached measure will have to assume the responsibility of voting against the whole bill.

This is what certain opponents of daylight saving have done with the measure to repeal the Daylight Saving Law.

In the House of Representatives they attached it to the Agricultural Appropriation Bill. Happily there was enough sentiment in the House against this rider method of making law to remove this rider from the bill. Appropriation bills have to originate in the House of Representatives, and then they go from there to the Senate. When the Agricultural Bill reached the Senate, this rider was reattached to it by the Senate Committee on Agriculture.

Popular indignation against this method of legislation ought to be so strong that the Senate will remove that rider. The issue is something more important than daylight saving. It is an issue that concerns the very nature of representative government. If daylight saving cannot be repealed without a majority against it, it ought not to be repealed at all. If a majority is against it, it can be repealed by direct vote. To attempt to legislate on a subject like this without ascertaining and recording the will of those entitled to vote upon it is to nullify to a measurable degree the principle of self-government and to substitute oligarchy.

POPULAR FALLACIES

III—THAT GOVERNMENTS DERIVE THEIR JUST POWERS FROM THE CONSENT OF THE GOVERNED

CONSENT of the governed does not make the government just.

The Negroes in the United States consented to slavery; at least they acquiesced in it. They did not revolt. When the Civil War gave them opportunity to run away, comparatively few took advantage of the opportunity. Most of them remained working in the fields and in the homes for the masters who were fighting to prevent their emancipation. But their consent did not make slavery just.

The German people consented to the German Government. When their Government entered upon war to win a world domination, they did not protest, but through their chosen representatives voted the money for the campaign. When Belgium was overrun, when some of its citizens were deported and others murdered in cold blood, when its banks were robbed and its women were raped, the German people consented to the robbery, the murder, the raping. When the Lusitania was piratically sunk, they not only consented, they publicly celebrated that achievement by processions and medals. But their consent did not make those crimes the acts of a just government.

The want of consent by the governed does not make the government unjust.

The government of a prison is not unjust whenever the prisoners object to the rules of the warden. The government of a school is not unjust whenever the pupils object to the rules of the principal. The government of a family is not unjust whenever the children object to the commands of the parent.

The consent of the governed may make the community contented. It may give the community peace. It may give the community a certain degree of prosperity. But it does not make the government just. Government is just only when its laws conform to the eternal laws of the moral world. It is just in the intent of the lawmakers only when their purpose is to apply to the conditions of their age and country those eternal laws.

The biographer of Tolstoy tells us that in his boyhood he had the idea that by stooping down and clasping his hands underneath his knees if he jumped off a porch he would soar. He tried the experiment—and did not soar. Flying was achieved by a different method. Inventors studied the birds, discovered the secret of their flight—powerful muscles, hollow bones, strength mated to lightness—and by conforming their schemes to the laws discovered by them in nature conquered the air.

There are laws of health. They are not imposed upon the body; they are written in the constitution of the body. A certain modern school of philosophy assumes that pain is evil but God is good, and therefore pain exists only in the evil thoughts, and it attempts to cure pain by changing the thoughts. The scientist studies the human body, learns by his study the laws of health and the causes of disease, and with much painstaking and many a temporary error builds up a system of healing based on law.

There are laws of the social order. The community which obeys them is prosperous. The community which disregards them suffers. An admirable summary of these laws of the social order is furnished by the Ten Commandments, which may be epitomized thus:

Reverence God, not the mere symbols and images which men make of God. Respect your ancestors. Keep a little time free from drudgery for a ministry to the higher life. Regard the four fundamental rights of your fellow-men—the rights of person, of property, of the family, and of reputation. And do this heartily, because you desire their protection as well as your own.

Whenever these laws are set aside tragedy is the result.

The German nation discarded them. It did not reverence God. With colossal self-conceit it summoned God to be its ally in a war of conquest. It disavowed all laws, human and divine. It declared that necessity knows no law. It substituted self-will for the will of the Eternal—with tragical results to itself and to the world.

The Bolsheviki have discarded all laws but those of their own creation. They ignore God. They treat all that past ages have wrought as a colossal blunder. They raze to the ground the edifice which past generations have reared and propose to build a new edifice on a new foundation. They disregard the fundamental rights of persons and property and avow their purpose so to do. They substitute the will of the mob for the will of the Czar and the rule of the proletariat for the rule of the bureaucracy. And the results of this substitution of self-will for the will of God are even more tragic in Russia than in Germany.

The laws of the beehive are not imposed on the bees by the bee-keeper. They are wrought by the Creator of the bees in their nature. If the bee-keeper understands these laws and conforms his regulations to these laws, the hive is prosperous and honey is the result. The laws of the human hive are not made by the men who inhabit it. They are written by man's Creator in the nature of the human soul. Conformity to the laws of nature which have been wrought by the Creator in the physical universe is the secret of science; conformity to the laws of life which have been wrought by the Creator in the human body is the secret of health; conformity to the laws of the social order which have been wrought by the Creator in the souls of men is the secret of justice, liberty, and peace.

Justice is conformity to divine law.

Liberty is voluntary self-enforcement of divine law.

Peace is habitual harmony with divine law.

Democracy is the spirit of justice, liberty, and peace in the community—in one word, brotherhood.

The saying, "The people can do no wrong," we must send to the rubbish pile with that other saying, "The king can do no wrong." The infallibility of the majority is no better than the infallibility of kings.

Our statesmen will not give peace to the world by a blind acceptance of the formula, "The self-determination of the people." Our legislators will not give prosperity to the United States by simply reflecting the popular will. The popular will may be determined by popular prejudice, and an appeal always lies from Philip drunk to Philip sober.

Probably our Government is more nearly just than the government of any other existing nation. But it is not wholly just so long as the poor and defenseless—whether white or black—are killed on suspicion, without trial and without a chance for self-defense; so long as thousands of children are allowed by a wealthy nation to grow up in ignorance without any opportunity for education; so long as plague spots are permitted to remain in sections of our great cities, sending out poison germs of ignorance and crime to infest the land.

The summons of Abraham Lincoln to his fellow-men in 1865 was a summons to do justly: "With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us finish the work we are in." That summons is as appealing now as then. It is the summons to the young men and young women graduating from colleges and high schools to-day to complete the work their fathers began when they declared their belief "that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men,"

THE LAST WORD AT VERSAILLES

IS IT REVENGE OR MAGNANIMITY?—THE GERMAN OBJECTIONS —THE MODIFIED TREATY—WHEN PEACE MUST BE STERN— M. CLEMENCEAU'S LETTER—NO "CONVENIENT PEACE"

IS THIS A STERN PEACE?

BY making modifications in the draft of the Treaty presented to the Germans, the Allied and Associated Powers have proved that they do not wish to be arbitrary. Indeed, the concessions they have granted raise the question whether they have not exercised magnanimity to the point beyond which it ceases to be a virtue.

The extreme to which the victorious Powers go in trying to reclaim Germany as a civilized nation is shown in their expression of readiness to contemplate the admission of Germany as an equal in the League of Nations in the "near future." Less than eight months ago the Germans, even in the midst of retreat, not for military purposes but in order to cripple their neighbors, were carrying on as best they could the practices which had characterized them for over four years and which it would be fulsome flattery to call brigandage. And now the people who suffered from their devastation and murder and rape and frightfulness are telling these Germans that if they comply with certain conditions as evidence of good faith they can become their partners. If anything comparable to this has ever happened in history, we fail to recall it.

This spirit of forgiveness is the more impressive because it has survived the expression of a spirit on the part of the Germans which is very far from repentance.

It was on May 7 that the Allies' conditions of peace were handed to the German delegates at Versailles. On June 15 the German reply and counter-proposals, together with the "covering letter" by Count von Brockdorff-Rantzau of May 29, were made public. It is in these replies and counter-proposals that the Germans show that they are still either unwilling or unable to express any consciousness of the nature of their deeds or of the situation in which they find themselves. They cry out against what they call virtual enslavement, they demand admission to the League of Nations immediately, they assail the abolition of German rights outside of Europe, asserting that they have shown themselves capable as colonizers, they demand that Germany be treated on a basis of equality and reciprocity, that there be no interference with German sovereignty, that, in short, the Allies deal with her as if she were as much entitled to victory as they. The Germans refuse to turn over the Kaiser or any other of the arch-criminals for trial, and propose an international court of neutrals to judge the fact of crime.

The whole basis of the German reply is in the assumption that the end of the war came, not as a result of victory by the Allies, but as the acceptance on all sides of President Wilson's Fourteen Points. They recall the interchange of notes last October and November between President Wilson and the Central Powers. They profess to have laid down their arms because they were induced to believe that they were going to be treated, not as vanquished criminals, but as one of two contracting parties who had already come to a common agreement.

A SO-CALLED PEACE OF REVENGE

Specifically, the Germans take exception to a great number of points in the Treaty. All these objections have been anticipated by people who have thought of the Allied Powers as being tarred with the same stick as Germany. Like the Germans, they regard this peace as a "peace of revenge."

It would take considerable space even to recapitulate the particular objections raised. They include objections to being called upon to recognize treaties which may be entered into hereafter by Germany's enemies; objections to the refusal, except by unanimous consent, to allow Austria to become part of Germany; objections of course to almost all the territorial arrangements, including the restoration of Alsace-Lorraine to France; objections to the economic arrangements as placing burdens upon the Germans which are greater than the burdens other people have to bear, and as therefore obviously designed to stamp out German competition; objections to any reparation for Montenegro, Serbia, and Rumania, since there was no attack there contrary to international law, as even the Germans acknowledge to be the case in Belgium; objections to the amount of damages to Belgium; objections to the arrangement as to the Sarre Valley and to the occupation of German territory on the left bank of the Rhine; objections to being deprived of shipping. The Germans acknowledge that they must put their resources to the service of restoration, but object to what they call infringements on Germany's "economic sovereignty."

It is hard to tell how much of this reply is merely an advocate's plea, trying to make the best of a bad case, and how much is really unconscious revelation of German incapacity to understand what Germany has done and what has happened to her.

THE MODIFICATIONS

Dissecting out from this mass of objections and counter-proposals certain points which seem reasonable, the Allied and Associated Powers made modifications in the Treaty. The principal changes are, briefly, agreements to arrange certain Polish-German frontier lines by plebiscite; to permit Germany to obtain a certain amount of coal from Silesia; to accord to Germany facilities so that she may survey the damage she has done and make proposals within four months as to her liabilities, and if an agreement is possible within two months thereafter to fix the amount of reparation at a definite figure; to change the arrangement for a plebiscite in Slesvig; to permit Germany an army of 200,000 men temporarily; and to allow Germany to enter the League within a short time provided Germany gives evidence of a stable government and a desire to observe her international obligations. These modifications are not all included in the Treaty, for some of them are embodied in a supplementary document.

A PEACE OF JUSTICE

With these modifications there went to the Germans a letter which is one of the most important documents of the whole war. It attempts to explain to the Germans why it is impossible for civilized peoples to deal with them as if they were normal. It is a letter written with great frankness, but exhibiting extraordinary patience. It gives the key to the whole Peace Treaty in this sentence: "The Allied and Associated Powers believe that they will be false to those who have given their all to save the freedom of the world if they consent to treat the war on any other basis than as a crime against humanity and right."

In response to the Germans' abundant references to Mr. Wilson's Fourteen Points and to the speeches of Mr. Lloyd George and others, this letter, written by M. Clemenceau as President of the Peace Conference, quotes some things from Mr. Wilson which the Germans have forgotten. These are in a passage from the President's speech of April 6, 1918, in which he said that to Germany's assertion that force alone can decide there was only one response possible: "Force, force to the utmost, force without stint or limit, the righteous and triumphant force which shall make the law of the world, and cast every selfish dominion down in the dust." The letter quotes also from Mr. Lloyd George a passage in which he says: "There is no security in any land without the certainty of punishment. There is no protection for life, property, or money in a state where the criminal is more powerful than the law. The law of nations is no exception. . . . There have been many times in the history of the world criminal states. We are dealing with one of them now. There will always be criminal states until the reward of international crime becomes too precarious to make it profitable, and the punishment of international crime becomes too sure to make it attractive." The letter also quotes from M. Clemenceau and Signor Orlando, to show that already during the war the Allies were seeking justice—"justice for the dead and wounded . . . justice for the peoples who now stagger under war debts, . . . justice for those millions whose homes and lands and property German savagery has spoiled and destroyed."

The letter not only reviews in simple and clear language the crime of Germany in beginning the war, not only her crimes of frightfulness, of introducing poisonous gas and long-distance bombing of towns, and of massacring passengers and civilian sailors in mid-ocean, but also the crimes which Germany committed when she "ruined the industries, the mines, and the machinery of neighboring countries, not during battle, but with the deliberate and calculated purpose of enabling her own industries to seize their markets before their industries could recover from the devastation thus wantonly inflicted upon them." The letter points out that if Germany now suffers hardships they are hardships which she has brought upon herself, and this sentence ought to be written where all who pass may read:

If the German people themselves, or any other nation, are to be deterred from following the footsteps of Prussia; if mankind is to be lifted out of the belief that war for selfish ends is legitimate to any state; if the old era is to be left behind, and nations as well as individuals are to be brought beneath the reign of law; even if there is to be early reconciliation and appeasement, it will be because those responsible for concluding the war have had the courage to see that justice is not deflected for the sake of a convenient peace.

This letter, free from bitterness, but equally free from soft sentimentalism, points out that a change in the form of government in Germany is not enough to effect the settlement of the war itself. The German revolution did not appear until defeat had wiped out all German hope of profit from war. Until then the German people supported the war, voted credits, obeyed every order, however savage, and shared the responsibility of their Government. They would have acclaimed victory as they acclaimed the outbreak of the war. "They cannot now pretend, having changed their rulers after the war was lost, that it is justice that they should escape the consequences of their deed. The Allied and Associated Powers," concludes the spokesman of the Peace Conference, "therefore believe that the peace they have proposed is fundamentally a peace of justice."

IF THE GERMANS DO NOT SIGN

Thus has gone to the Germans what M. Clemenceau declares to be the Peace Conference's last word. A decision by Germany either for or against signing the Treaty must be reached, she was informed, by June 23. It is not inconceivable that there should be some extension of time, but there does not seem to be any ground for expectation that there will be an extension of negotiations. If the peace is not signed, Germany was notified, the armistice will terminate and the Powers will take such steps as they think needful to enforce their terms.

COLLEGE MEN IN THE WAR

A TYPICAL VICTORY COMMENCEMENT TRIBUTE

OFFERED AT THE EXERCISES AT HAMILTON COLLEGE JUNE 16, 1919,

BY FREDERICK M. DAVENPORT

This year at Commencement time there will have been many tributes to college men in the war. This by Senator Davenport, who is Professor of Law and Civil Polity at Hamilton College, is typical. What he says of the men of the college at Clinton, New York, is equally applicable to those of hundreds of other American colleges. More than that—since the college men of this country are representative young men, its substance is true of the whole of the young manhood of America.—THE EDITORS.

"The years go fast in Oxford, the golden years and gay,
The hoary colleges look down on careless boys at play.
But when the bugle sounded war, they put their games away.

They left the peaceful river, the cricket ground, the quad,
The shaven lawns of Oxford, to seek a bloody sod.

They gave their merry youth away for country and for God."

SO it was with the men of Hamilton and with all the college men of America in the great war, the living and the dead. One morning, care-free and glad of heart in the glory of their youth. The next, setting forth upon the great adventure, with resolution on their serious faces, willing and unafraid. It was not all the way the enthusiasm of devotion. There were hours, they have told us, when the fires of idealism burned low. There were nights of terror and days of strain and darkness, when the simple prayer of the humble homesick soul was: "Make me a soldier, Lord!" "Make me a man, O Lord!" "Help me to die, O Lord!" But out of the experience of despondency and doubt there grew the calm, the confidence, the grim endurance, the consciousness of responsibility and power.

No one who has looked upon the great marching columns returned from France can have any other feeling than that of confident assurance that the war has chastened and strengthened the young fighting breed of America. It is evident that they all, like Alan Seeger, feel their manhood keenly. Strangely enough, after all our fears and forebodings of the frailty of mankind, the greatest success of the war has been human personality. At one time or another, in the matter of the armies of the free nations, preparation has failed, guns have failed, planes have failed, governments have failed, but the human spirit has not failed. Whether it be the superb and historic genius of Joffre and Foch, without which the war could never have been won by the soldiers of freedom, or whether it be the marvelous skill and physical and moral endurance of the plain man, in the sky, in the trenches, under the sea, the human race may well lift its head high. There has been no greater level of achievement among the sons of men. As for the American people, they have been hard put to it to know whether to admire more the valor and the leadership of many a splendid young officer, or the amazing every-day daring and efficiency such as was exemplified by the plain brawny Tennessee mountaineer who, having had detailed practice from boyhood in picking off squirrels in the tops of tall trees in the homeland by shooting them through the head so as not to mangle the meat, proceeded single-handed to pick off the members of a German machine-gun battalion, killing twenty-four, and with a few comrades making prisoners of 132 others, and being decorated therefor by the generalissimo of the Allied armies!

All is well with the human spirit while it can continuously endure such gigantic shock of mechanical forces, such agonies of mind and body, and come off more than conqueror! The human race never before demonstrated itself to be so thoroughly worth saving, and human progress towards the goal never before seemed to be so greatly worth having. And all this in spite of the fact that many—aye, most—of the governments of mankind had shown vast capacity to falter and bungle.

But the young manhood of America did not falter. They interpreted the real America to the world—the America of might and justice. They demonstrated that the flower of power is not brutality, but unselfishness; that the meek inherit the earth because they have the mental and moral muscle; that genuine altruism is life to spare, superb physiological reserve of body and brain seeking new channels for the outlet of its energies; that sympathy, gentleness, generosity, are the supreme manifestations of the survival of both the fittest and the best, whether in the strong man or the responsible state. Our young crusaders interpreted the real America to the world.

And now we have them back again; soon all who survive will be back again, melted into the life and merged into the organization of the hundred millions. How much we expect from them at home! By the grace of the spiritual energy and vision which they incarnate, neither Junkerism and militarism nor the blind forces of anarchistic democracy now sweeping across the world shall rule America. The experience of the war has disclosed two human groups whom the free nations must put under foot—the merely selfish men of power and cunning at the top, and the anarchistic communists at the bottom. And the war revealed also two human groups whom the free nations must at all costs protect and conserve—on the one hand, the exceptional men of organization and management and initiative and of a reasonable altruism; and, on the other hand, the great body of plain producers and workers who make up the bone and sinew of the nation in time of peace or war. By the grace of the spiritual energy and vision which our young soldiers of freedom incarnate, America is to become neither the exploiter's paradise nor the theater of "the bum's millennium."

We are to assume, I suppose, that no man can yet see, except by faith, how much of good is to come out of the recent giant conflict with evil, how much of hope out of the new covenant of peace. But at least not for America the so-called great social revolution! A larger measure of objective equality there will no doubt be; we cannot tell how much. But men are no more subjectively equal than they were before the war began, or than they will be when unnumbered centuries pass by. Following the biologic law of heredity, some men are superior and some men are inferior, and always will be, in counsel, in resourcefulness, in honorable dealing, and in self-sacrifice. The sons of Mary and the sons of Martha must continue to bear in far different degrees the burden of toil and discomfort, the weight of authority and power.

And so we are looking to our surviving young militant manhood, whom we happily have with us again, to help to conserve what the war has revealed as our most precious possession—the individual initiative of America; not by the old law of the jungle, the law of the survival of the fittest brute, but by the employment of those wiser and simpler social processes and safeguards which in modern life give individual initiative its chance to break through the crust of circumstance, and which protect the right of each by the might of all. Just as the deliberate initiative of the first transatlantic flier was protected and made effective for human advance by the organized fleet of American destroyers, so by more and more favorable social environment in the country at large will the natural aristocracy of America come up through to authority and power and the quality of governments cease to be inferior to the quality of the governed.

The spirit of the college we call Hamilton has always been the spirit of leadership and sacrifice. This was the spirit of Kirkland and Alexander Hamilton, and of the young soldiers of '61 to '65, who knew the call and marched away when Lincoln called for men. It is the spirit of her sons in civil life who have blazed the paths of peace. These all, like a cloud of witnesses, hover over this Commencement of victory. And the heart of the Alma Mater is touched with gladness in the glory that she shares. Those sons of hers who died, these sons of hers who live, "she brought them forth to live or die by freedom, justice, truth."

As for the living—

"They are but fragments of the Nation's splendor,
Handfuls of might amid a mighty host.
Yet she who saw them go with proud surrender
May surely claim to love them first and most."

As for the fallen—

"They who had all, gave all. Their half-writ story
Lies in the empty halls they knew so well;
But they, the knights of God, shall see his glory,
And find the Grail e'en in the fires of hell."

THE CASE OF CHINA

BY DR. C. T. WANG, DELEGATE OF THE CHINESE REPUBLIC TO THE PEACE CONFERENCE

AN AUTHORIZED INTERVIEW WITH GREGORY MASON,
STAFF CORRESPONDENT OF THE OUTLOOK

"THE peace of the whole world is endangered by the decision of the Peace Conference to give Japan the special rights and privileges in Shantung formerly held by Germany," said Dr. C. T. Wang, one of the most important members of the Chinese delegation to negotiate peace at Paris. "We intend to appeal from the decision of the Peace Conference to the League of Nations. If Japan is left in possession of these particular privileges in Shantung, that province will become an Oriental Alsace-Lorraine. If you Americans will just think how you would feel if Japan were awarded the State of California, you can imagine about how we feel as regards Shantung. Or, to use another illustration, how would the Belgians feel if Antwerp were awarded to Great Britain because the British soldiers were instrumental in driving the Germans out of Belgium?"

Dr. Wang was speaking without excitement, but with great gravity. We were in his office in the Hotel Lutetia in Paris. He was leaning his elbow on his desk, on which were conspicuous a beautiful jade ash-tray and several copies of The Outlook. His pleasant and very intelligent face looks older than his years. He was graduated from Yale in the class of 1910, and before we began to talk politics he tried to find if we had not some mutual college acquaintances. He had not much success until he mentioned "Ted" Coy, Walter Logan, and Harry Van Sinderen, all famous athletes in Dr. Wang's time at Yale. Although he is one of the youngest members of the distinguished group of diplomats which the Peace Conference brought together in Paris, he is accounted one of the most able.

"The Chinese people," said Dr. Wang, "are very slow to wrath, but they are also very slow to forget an injury. They never forgave the Manchus for their invasion. And they bided their time till the day came when they were strong enough to kick the Manchus off the Dragon throne. I fear they will never forget the Japanese occupation of Shantung, which will be considered by the masses as an unwarrantable invasion. And from this feeling may come a disturbance which will shake the peace of the whole Far East."

"But the danger is not to China alone," Dr. Wang continued; "the whole world ought to open its eyes. The creation of this special position for Japan in Shantung is a long step toward a very dangerous degree of Japanese domination in all China. Suppose Japan gets her hand on China's vastly rich mineral resources, and suppose she begins to train and direct the great reservoir of man power found in China's population of four hundred million. Can you not see that there would be a menace to the world much more serious than Germany could ever be?"

"You think there is a dangerous military spirit in Japan?" I asked.

"There certainly is," replied the distinguished Chinese delegate, without hesitation.

"Let me say that I have very many Japanese friends, especially among the Christian Japanese, for I am a Christian myself. But the unpleasant fact remains that the Japanese Government is moved by a spirit of militarism, imperialism, and all those things which have come to be called Prussian. Really, I am very much worried about the effect of this decision on the people of China. Perhaps there will be some horrible reaction, possibly an uprising of monarchists with the aim of breaking down all the last walls between us and Japan and accepting the Japanese as the avowed directors of the destinies of the two great Oriental peoples. Or perhaps general anarchy. You see, Shantung is the cradle of China's civilization. It was the birthplace of her two greatest sages—Confucius and Mencius. The seventy-third direct descendant of Confucius, whose name is Kung Hsiang-ko, is now on his way to Paris to plead that this holy land of the Chinese people be kept Chinese.

"There are more than thirty-eight million people in Shantung, or nearly as many as there are in France. The population is so dense and the economic preponderance of Shantung so marked in North China that the allotment of special interests to the Japanese seems bound to lead to unwarranted exploitation of the Chinese inhabitants and unwarranted interference in our commercial affairs."

Dr. Wang here produced a map of China. But before indicating with a pencil the localities affected by the Japanese claims he reviewed the manner in which Germany had originally sunk its claws into Shantung. He recalled how two German missionaries were killed in China, how even after their families had been indemnified and the murderer punished the German Government used the killing as a pretext for demanding a ninety-nine-year lease on the territory of Kiaochau with the harbor of Tsingtao, the Trans-Shantung Railway (known as the Tsingtao-Tsinan Railway or Kiaochau-Tsinan Railway), and other railway as well as mining rights in that province.

"You can see what a serious fix we are in," observed Dr. Wang, "if you look at this map. Through the Trans-Shantung Railway, with its western terminus at the provincial capital of Tsinan, where it flanks the northern section of the Tientsin-Pukow Railway, Japan will control all of Shantung and menace the northern half of this vital trunk line as well. Next, by financing, constructing, and supplying the materials for the first of two other railway lines, i. e., a line from the city of Kaomi, on the Trans-Shantung Railway, to a strategic point dominating the southern section of the same Tientsin-Pukow Railway, Japan will virtually dominate the great rail artery binding Tientsin (the port of Peking) and North China with the Yangtze Valley and South China.

"The next step will be by financing the second of the two railway lines—i. e., a road practically extending the Trans-Shantung Railway from Tsinan, where it will cut the Tientsin-Pukow trunk line, to a point to the west on the Peking-Hankow line—Japan will flank the other of the two main lines which connect Peking and North China with central and southern China.

"Remember, too, that Japan controls the railway systems in South Manchuria and eastern Inner Mongolia, and you will realize what a grip Japan will have on the rail arteries of China north of the Yangtze. That means that Peking will be isolated. Although the British force which co-operated in reducing German ports at Tsingtao landed directly before their objective, the Japanese landed at Lungkow, 150 miles to the north, and sent a strong force to Tsinan, 280 miles inland, to the west of Kiaochau. They are still keeping troops at Lungkow and Tsinan. At any time, therefore, the Japanese can close their pincers and nip Peking. Finally, Peking can be blockaded by sea also, since the Japanese stronghold at Port Arthur dominates the whole Gulf of Pechihli and the port of Tientsin.

"Incidentally," Dr. Wang continued, "though China views all foreign occupation of these territories as derogating from her own territorial integrity, it is worth pointing out that the value of the British stronghold of Weihaiwei might be much diminished if the Power holding Port Arthur were to get its hands on either Chefoo or Lungkow, both of which are to the 'strategic rear' of the British leasehold.

"To see Japan given this territory merely because she wrested it from Germany is pretty hard when one knows that China was willing to declare war on Germany in 1914 in order to attack the Germans in Kiaochau, and also again in 1915, but that both times the opposition of Japan induced the Great Powers to demand that China remain neutral."

"But of course," I reminded Dr. Wang, "Japan has solemnly promised to give back to China all but a bare foothold for herself in Shantung."

"No doubt," he replied, "Japan will give us back most of the rocky barren hillsides, and keep the rich places and the strategic points for herself. She will give us back the shells and keep the oysters."

I asked a question about the status of the famous Twenty-one Demands, which Japan presented to China in 1915, and which even many Japanese to-day admit exceeded the bounds of modest ambition.

"The Twenty-one Demands," said Dr. Wang, "are still likely to be enforced against China unless the Allies make Japan renounce this programme of imperialism. You understand the Twenty-one Demands as well as I do, and there is no use reviewing them all here. Suffice it to say that their purpose is to give Japan ultimate domination of Chinese commerce, natural resources, railways, finance, military resources, and governmental affairs generally. It seems almost superfluous to point out what a danger there is here again to the whole world if Japan is allowed to achieve her aim.

"On this I repeat that we look for justice from the League of Nations. We Chinese point out that we agreed to the Twenty-one Demands under duress at a time when all the great Allied Powers were too busy fighting Germany to help us. We claim that the acceptance of President Wilson's Fourteen Points as a programme for war and peace by Japan as one of the Allies abrogated the forced treaty of 1915 between Japan and China; the whole spirit of that treaty being contrary to the Wilsonian principles.

"You know, the idea of the League of Nations," Dr. Wang remarked, with a smile, "appeals naturally to us Chinese. Confucius was the originator of the idea. Only, instead of the League of Nations, he called it the Ta Tung Shih Chieh. Japan's favorite claim that she is a sort of guardian for the whole Far East by divine right will have to be relegated to the background now that we have the League of Nations."

"Well, what do you Chinese think about the claim Japan pressed before the Peace Conference for the recognition of the equality of all nations, Dr. Wang?"

The Chinese Yale man smiled his contagious smile again as he replied:

"China knows that equality of races forms the foundation of the League of Nations. Japan's demand to include such a phrase in the Covenant was pure camouflage. It was a smoke-screen to cover a real objective. The idea was to press this hard, knowing that President Wilson would refuse it; but after he had refused it the Japanese then pointed to Kiaochau, and said, 'Well, give us that, anyhow.' And President Wilson said, 'Well, I guess we'll have to give those Japanese something.'"

"You spoke a minute ago, Dr. Wang, of the possibility of anarchy developing in China as a result of disappointment over the outcome of the Peace Conference. Have you any Chinese Bolsheviks?"

"I was not thinking of Bolshevism, which is not anarchy, although the two things are often confused," Dr. Wang answered. "I was thinking of possible sporadic outbreaks which may occur in my country, the result of local dissatisfaction with the success of Japanese attempts to meddle in China. No, there is at present no inclination toward Bolshevism in China. You know, a distinguished statesman, Wang An-shih, of the Sung Dynasty, tried a form of state Socialism eight hundred years ago, and it failed. Remember, Bolshevism is a product of capitalistic oppression. China, as every Western student knows, has no oppressive capitalism. But Japan has that very thing and is in great danger of developing Bolshevism. The Japanese aristocracy is trembling in its boots to-day lest the tables be turned, as they were turned in Russia, and the Japanese aristocracy be plunged to the depths now occupied by the Japanese laboring classes."

"What effect might the success of Bolshevism in Japan have on Japanese relations with Russia and Germany, Dr. Wang?"

The Chinese delegate laughed and got up to pace the floor. "I very well remember your interview in The Outlook with the Japanese Premier, Count Terauchi, in which he spoke frankly of a possible German-Russian-Japanese alliance. Undoubtedly such an alliance is a possibility against which the rest of us must be on guard. China would be in a very uncomfortable predicament before such a triple alliance. But the chances of that alliance are much greater if you have reactionary and autocratic governments in all three of those countries, such as you have in Japan to-day. Undoubtedly countries ruled by Bolshevik governments are drawn into alliances with each other, but those alliances are not so dangerous to other countries as the alliances between reactionary governments of the old type. I believe that a good many people are unnecessarily afraid of Bolshevism, and I believe that a good many people are unnecessarily suspicious of Russia. I believe in Russia. I believe she has a big future. I like and I admire the Russian people."

In response to a question about recent developments in Korea, Dr. Wang said:

"There is a great deal of unrest in Korea. The people are agitating for the right to govern themselves. But of course China can have nothing to do with this movement."

The discussion then turned to the local affairs of China.

Dr. Wang declared that prospects are bright for a growth of better relations between the north and south of China, "in spite of Japan's efforts to keep the two elements apart, Japan backing the north against the south as usual." It is an interesting fact that Dr. Wang, like all the other Chinese delegates to the Peace Conference, is from South China, which has in most periods of Chinese history produced the brightest minds.

Dr. Wang believes that Germany has little future in China. Two thousand Germans were sent home a few months ago, and there are now few Teutons left in the Oriental Republic, except a handful of missionaries. He reports that the campaign against opium is going on apace. Recently three million dollars' worth of the drug was burned. It is an interesting coincidence that Germany, Bulgaria, Turkey, and Hungary all refused to sign or ratify the anti-opium agreement of 1912, while of the nations which later became allied against those Powers in war Serbia alone did not sign.

The distinguished Chinese concluded this interview with a plea that China be allowed and assisted to work out her own destiny unhampered by foreign interference.

"I would like through your paper," Dr. Wang said, "to appeal to the American people for their sympathy in our efforts to get on our own feet. America has always been a sympathetic friend of China."

"China wants to get out of the stage of semi-dependence on foreign Powers. Think of the spheres of influence these Powers claim in China by cutting up portions of China within which the Powers claimed rights to enjoy reserved territorial advantages or preferential or exclusive rights and privileges. Imagine the presence of foreign soldiers in Peking and sundry other places, some by treaty rights, but most of them with no rights at all. Although China is a full-fledged member of the Universal Postal Union since 1914, yet there are numerous foreign post offices in China. Then again important and strategic points on the coast are being held by foreign Powers as leased territories where they have built forts and stationed troops. China sends her exports to foreign countries subject to the tariff rates of the various countries concerned, and yet she is forced to levy only a uniform five per cent on her imports. Finally, foreigners living in China do not come under the Chinese laws. They enjoy what is known as extraterritoriality. With such handicaps you can well imagine the difficulties which China has to face in solving her problems."

"This is an anomalous state of affairs, constituting in China a virtual imperium in imperio, a real menace to the territorial integrity and political independence of China. We are not blaming you for this condition. It came about through our own deplorable weakness and backwardness. We desire on our part to bring about reforms, and we ask that you assist us in our reconstruction."

"If you respond to this appeal to your generosity, you will help China along the road to progress more than any of you can realize. And under the League of Nations there will be less need than ever for the exercise of these peculiar rights you have held so long."

"China is looming up," concluded Dr. Wang. "Slowly but surely the people are awakening. Slowly but surely she is climbing back to a position in the first rank of civilized nations, a position as honorable and dignified as she held when western Europe was in darkness."

AN INDIAN FAMILY RESUMING POSSESSION OF THE RESTORED LANDS ON CHRISTMAS DAY

THE WINNING OF AN INDIAN RESERVATION

HOW THEODORE ROOSEVELT AND FRANK MEAD RESTORED THE MOJAVE-APACHES TO THEIR OWN

BY NATALIE CURTIS

"THE sacredness of treaties"—ask the American Indian what he knows about scraps of paper! There was one occasion, however, when Theodore Roosevelt, as President, restored the faith of the Indians in Government promises and compelled the fulfillment of the pledged word of the United States.
